Irish Church Act was passed full compensation was given to every person, down to the youngest juniors, for the loss sustained by the passing of that Act. And, again, in the case of the Irish Land Act, the right of compensation was admitted to such an extent as to include even compensation for improvements. There was nothing which could be brought forward in which that House had not for centuries given compensation when any person was being deprived of his right, and yet it was now proposed to abolish one-seventh part, and in some cases much more, of the trade of 17,000 or 18,000 persons in Ireland, without giving them any compensation whatever. Would the House sanction such an injustice? Hon. Gentlemen from the North of Ireland might be anxious to pass this Bill; but they should, at least, be just, and not pass it at the expense of those who were getting their living by this trade. His hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon appeared to think more of this Sabbatarian measure than he did of the Irish Education Bill, respecting which he refused to give way when his own Bill was brought up on Report. It might be as well to remind the House of the working of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland; and he would quote from The Scotsman, one of the highest authorities on the subject. An hon. Member from Scotland, whose name he would not mention, had told the House of Commons that "No one in the North now questioned the value of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act," whereupon The Scotsman said—

> "There are a great many people here who question its 'value,' and there are none whose statements with regard to the general condition of the country do more to put the 'value' of that piece of legislation in a questionable light than those who support the attempt to coerce the population into sobriety. They never open their mouths to speak upon this subject without deploring the enormous increase that is taking place in the drunkenness of the country, and producing statistics to prove that such is the case. So many more gallons of whisky are being consumed per head of the population, so many more arrests for drunkenness are being made by the police, such and such an increase per cent is taking place in female intemperance, &c. We are all only too familiar here with the thrilling and three times thrice-told tale. But then, all the time that this frightful development of national debauchery has been proceeding, the Forbes-Mackenzie Act has been hard at work restricting the hours of daily drinking, and extinguishing entirely the sale of drink during the seventh part of the year, that seventh part, moreover, being the very part during which it is supposed drinkers would be most at leisure and disposed to indulge their propensity. English and Irish Members of Parliament point to this fact, and contend that if Scotland, with the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, is, on the showing of its most ardent temperance reformers, outstripping in drunkenness the respective countries which have no Forbes-Mackenzie Act, the evidence is not in favour of that Act."

He maintained that similarly, after a very short trial, the evidence would not be in favour of the Act in Ireland either. The people would be driven to drink in private and shebeen houses, over which the police had no control, and the consequence would be greater demoralization and increased drunkenness. The Scotsman proceeded—

> "How was this argument met? By quoting from the Edinburgh Police Returns to show that fewer people are found drunk in the streets on Sunday since the Forbes-Mackenzie Act closed the public-houses. That may be true; but it does not meet the allegation that since the Forbes-Mackenzie Act shut the public-houses on Sundays, the Scotch people have taken to drinking more than ever, and much more than the Irish or English, on other days of the week."

He maintained, without fear of contradiction, that the same result would obtain in Ireland if this Bill passed. He could assert as a positive fact that in those parts of Ireland where the Sunday closing of public-houses was carried out voluntarily, there was a larger amount of drunkenness than in places where the voluntary closing system was not adopted.

> "If," continued the article, "an advocate will insist upon being guided by the statistics, he ought to be of opinion that if the Forbes-Mackenzie Act protects the Sundays, it abuses the other days, and if it is good for Sabbatarian purposes, it is not good for real temperance purposes."

So this Bill might be good for promoting Sabbatarian ideas; but it would not further the cause of temperance. If the intention of the promoters of the Bill was to promote temperance, they would have proposed to close public-houses on some other day in the week in which there was more drunkenness, for it had been shown, over and over again, that in Ireland Sunday was the one day in the week on which there was less drunkenness than on any other day. The Government had exempted from the operation of the Bill the five large towns where there was the largest amount of drunkenness. They said, in effect—"We know you want to get drunk in the large towns, and we will leave you to do it; but in the country places, where you don't want to get drunk, we will close the public-houses, and not allow you to get drunk." So much for the consistency of the Government.

> "If it is good for Sabbatarian purposes, it is not good for real temperance purposes. May there not be some connection of cause and effect between these two inferences? If a nation is drilled into the superstition that temperance is simply a sort of 'Sabbath' propriety, may they not be disposed to put it off with their Sunday clothes? The Forbes-Mackenzie Act virtually says—'Six days shalt thou drink,' and it seems to be taken at its word."

What rational argument could be given for the view that people should be more sober on the Sabbath than at other times? The eloquence of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) and of the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had not shown that temperance would increase if this Bill passed. The House had never heard what the Bill was really intended for. They suspected it was a Sabbatarian measure, and not one in the interests of temperance; because if it were in the interests of temperance it would propose the closing of public-houses, not on the most sober day of the week, but on the most drunken days, and at fairs, markets, and so forth.

> "And yet," concluded the article in The Scotsman, "what else is the meaning of Sunday closing? Legislation based on Pharisaism will never make a people better or morally stronger. All that it does is to foster the common enough tendency to believe that sham solemnity, skin-deep virtue, and moral whitewash, in some way or other make up for the want of that simplicity, veracity, and seriousness of character which are indispensable to self-control or any other genuine excellence. Forbes-Mackenzieism has every appearance of being more decorous than wholesome."

He hoped the House would have too much respect for itself to allow such a tyrannical and unjust Bill as that now before them to be run through the House of Lords in three or four days at the end of the Session. At any rate, he hoped the House of Lords would have too much respect for itself to allow it to pass in that way. In Newcastle West, in his own county, 11,059 persons, chiefly working men, had petitioned against this Bill, while the Petition in its favour was signed by only 450 names, notwithstanding the fact that the paid agents of the Alliance were there for two days canvassing for signatures. He did not see that many Petitions in favour of the Bill had been presented, either by the hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Conor Don), or the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and yet those hon. Members thought they had a right to force this Bill upon the people. He admitted that there were a large number in Ireland who were in favour of this Bill, but they were, for the most part, those who would not be affected by it. They were men who never had to resort to public-houses at any time, having well-stocked cellars of their own. A good deal had been said about the Petitions in favour of this Bill. These were got up by pious old ladies of the Moody and Sankey type, and by Sunday school teachers, who got little boys and girls to sign their names without their knowing in the least what they were signing. He challenged the promoters of the Bill to produce a single Petition on their side signed by bonâ fide working men and women, who would be inconvenienced by the passing of this Bill. Out of 24 Petitions presented during one week in favour of this measure 13 came from places in England; and out of 11 similar Petitions presented in another week, 10 came from England and Scotland. If the promoters of the Bill would consent to drop it for the present Session, he would challenge them to hold public meetings on the question during the Recess, to have a disinterested person appointed as umpire, and the votes of the people taken, and he promised that if the promoters of Sunday closing had a majority in their favour he would not next Session raise his voice in opposition to the Bill. But he felt that he was not representing a class in that House. He did not belong to either Whigs or Tories, but was a representative of the people, and quite as much of non-electors as of electors; and he felt that he should not be discharging his duty honestly and fairly to those non-electors if he allowed this Coercion Bill to pass without, not merely protesting against it, but without using every means in his power to defeat it; because, view it as they would, it was as much a Coercion Bill as the Crimes and Outrages Bill. The position of the Government was most inconsistent. They would not admit that the Bill was theirs, and yet they gave greater facilities for passing it than he ever remembered to have been given to any other private Bill. They had given to its promoters three clear days, and only on the preceding day they were led to suppose that the Government intended to proceed with Business of their own that day, but when the House met they found this private Member's Bill first on the Paper. It was entirely unprecedented for the House to be discussing such a measure on a Saturday. He gave every credit to the temperance party, because they were sincere and zealous in trying to convert the people from drunkenness; but he gave no credit to the Sabbatarian element, which was the backbone of this Bill. He believed they cared very little about the temperance party or about the demoralization of the people of Ireland. Their idea was to introduce the Scotch Sabbatarian system into Ireland. In many of the country districts in Ireland the sale of intoxicating liquors formed only a small portion of the trade of the shopkeepers. They sold all sorts of things—tea and sugar, bread and butter, powder and spades, and almost everything that could be mentioned. Under this Bill these people would be obliged to close their shops altogether, even against the sale of groceries; because if a policeman found any customer on licensed premises during prohibited hours, he could proceed against him and secure a conviction. He would only say, in conclusion, that he hoped the House of Lords would not so far stultify itself as to hustle this Bill through at this late period of the Session.

MR. WHEELHOUSE deeply regretted, for the sake of the Speaker and also of the officers of the House, that they should have been called upon to sit on Saturday for any purpose whatever, and more especially for that upon which they were now assembled, and for that reason he would endeavour to shorten any observations he had intended to make as much as possible. So far as the question of compensation was concerned, he did not propose to add one word to the arguments which had been advanced, and which he thought were both convincing and conclusive. He would deal with the third reading of this Bill, and with its antecedents and concomitants. This measure was about as undesirable as any that could be presented to a Legislature; and he ventured to assert that there was no body of a governmental character in Europe, with the exception of that of Great Britain, which would for a moment have entertained it. Personally, it did not matter to him what became of this Bill. Not one of its promoters would be affected by its passing, and probably that was the case also with nearly everyone who had the honour of a seat in that House. They were not going to shut up their own cellars or deprive themselves of a single glass of wine. They were not going to allow the Legislature to deal with them and their tastes, to say nothing of their interests. The object of the promoters of this Bill was to deal with a class infinitely below them—a class that could not speak for itself in that House to the same extent as the promoters could. To pass a measure of this kind was to deal with one class as if they were different beings from those occupying another station in life. He did not believe in class legislation, or in interfering with a man's domestic relations and habits in any way so long as he did not bring himself within the restraint of the criminal law. To tell a man that such legislation as this was not intended to coerce him and would be no interference with his rights, was to tell him what was at variance with the truth. He did not agree with teetotalers or their principles, and in that disagreement he was supported by nineteen-twentieths of the world at large. Under those circumstances was he to give up his views, was he to be coerced in his action by a body of people for whose views he had not the slightest approximation to respect, and who sought, at all times and under all circumstances, to force what they called their principles—what they meant by their principles he scarcely knew—absolutely down the throat of everyone who differed from them? What had been the conduct of the Government with regard to this Bill? In the first instance, the House was told that certain facilities would be afforded for passing it. Then the Government said that perhaps a day might be given. That day was given. Then after that, another day was appropriated to it; and now, at the last moment, when the opposition—which had been most legitimately conducted on principle from beginning to end—seemed in the ordinary course about to be successful, an opposition which would have given further time to see whether this Bill really was or was not desired in Ireland, the Government of the country—no, not the Government of the country, but certain Members of the Government, it being doubtful whether even a majority on the Treasury Bench—by a course of action as unprecedented as it was possible to conceive, caused the House to assemble on a Saturday morning at the close of the Session for the express and sole purpose of forcing this measure through the House if possible. It was only now that the House had learned from the Treasury Bench—the Members of which were at this moment conspicuous by their absence—that this Bill, which was originally a private Member's Bill, had been taken up by the Government. Surely, in all fairness, the Government ought to have given an earlier intimation of their policy. If the opponents of the Bill had been told that, at whatever cost and under whatever circumstances, the Treasury Bench was determined, after the principle of the Bill had been sold to the Government, to pass the wasted remnant of the measure, they could have understood such conduct, since, at all events, it would have been fair, open, and above-board. But what were the facts with regard to this Saturday Sitting? Last night the inference drawn from the statements of the Government was that to-day's Sitting was required for the Telegraphs Bill, and this morning hon. Members were astonished to find that this Bill had been postponed for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill, in order that the latter might be forced through the House. That was not just, it was not right, and, what was more, the means by which this had been effected would recoil on the heads of those who used them. They were told that the measure had been practically accepted by the House, and in reply he would call attention to the state of the Benches on both sides at the present moment. This Bill, if it passed at all, would pass by a scratch vote, and the Government would have done more to estrange and alienate its own supporters than any Government ever did before. They were told that this measure in some way or other was for the good of the people. ["Hear, hear!"] That sentiment was cheered by the only occupant at the present moment of the Government Bench. But in what way, and under what circumstances, would it benefit the people? It might be an intention to carry out certain principles in given ways; but to tell him that it was for the good of the people, to say that no single human being keeping within the law should have the opportunity of taking that which he thought reasonable, that which he thought necessary, at reasonable times and under reasonable circumstances, Sunday though it be, was to tell him what a child might be induced to believe, but what no man of full age would credit for one moment. Good of the people! [Mr. C. S. PARKER: Hear, hear!] Why should the House legislate for the alleged good of the people in matters in which the people could legislate very much better for themselves than the hon. Member for Perth, or anybody else? Then it was said that there had been a large number of Petitions presented in favour of the Bill; but it was one of the abuses of the right to petition to cover the floor of the House with Petitions got up by organizations — teetotal, Sabbatarian, or otherwise. He repeated, that the floor of the House had been deluged with Petitions signed by children in Sunday schools, who could not know anything about the merits of the question, and whose signature was strongly requested, if not absolutely demanded, of them. He maintained that this Bill did a substantial injustice to all publicans who had seven-day licences. No one doubted the power of the Government to do anything it pleased, to confiscate pretty nearly every vested interest, and to deal with any individual or right by Statute; but it was a wholly different matter to say that the Government was justified in so acting; and he was thankful to say there was an outside public which judged of the acts of the Government always carefully, sometimes partially, but, at the same time, with a knowledge, perhaps better than those in the House, as to who were the wire-pullers on occasions such as these. Could anyone doubt that this was a wire-pulling business from beginning to end—that there were people outside who were trying to force this Sabbatarian legislation upon Ireland? If they were right in trying to do so, who should deny that it was equally right to force precisely similar legislation on England? Why did not the Government give the teetotal organization facilities for introducing and passing similar legislation for England? If the teetotal organizations themselves had a particle of principle left, let them attempt to carry a similar Bill for England! Why deal with the matter piecemeal? The answer was clear—that no Government dare accept the proposition for Sunday closing in England. But the laws of the two countries were based upon the same principle, and, therefore, what was good for Ireland must also be good for England. This Bill was called a Sunday Closing Bill, but it was no such thing. It was a measure which, in the first instance, was emasculated, then it was eviscerated, and now it only remained a skeleton of dry bones. He would tell the House why the five large towns were excluded from the operation of the Bill. It was because it was perfectly well known that any attempt at Sunday closing in those towns would have caused such a furore throughout Ireland, that through the instrumentality of those cities an agitation fatal to the success of the Bill would have taken place. Why should the man of Belfast not be treated like the man of Armagh? Why should not the man in county Antrim be treated similarly to the inhabitant of county Clare? The standard of the Bill was deserted, the principle cut adrift, and the Bill now simply sought to coerce the peasant population in places where there was no need of a measure of this description; while the large towns, which, if any, were the places that needed restrictive legislation most, were left out of the operation of it altogether. The consequence of this Bill would be the result that had followed the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland. There would be secret, illicit, and constant consumption of intoxicants, and the shebeen houses would largely increase. Could anyone doubt for a moment that there would be illicit distilleries multiplied without end, and all over Ireland a man with a keg of spirits moving about here, there, and everywhere over the vast moorlands and mountain sides and, he regretted to add, uncultivated wastes of Ireland? That such would be the consequence was as palpable as that the sun shone on a cloudless midsummer morning. In conclusion, the hon. and learned Member denounced the Bill as class legislation, and characterized it as devoid of all fairness, equity, and justice.

Mr. M'LAREN said, he did not mean to enter into a discussion of the general question, as he understood the question was now narrowed to this point—should compensation be given to the publicans because of this Bill? The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth) had noticed the fact that no compensation had been given to the Scotch publicans when the Forbes-Mackenzie Act was passed, and he got rid of that difficulty by saying the systems of licensing in the two countries were not analogous. He, as a Scotch Member who knew something of the English and Irish system of licensing, asserted that they were analogous, and that, in so far as they differed, the claim of the Scotch publican for compensation was much stronger than that of the Irish publican. Before the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, the Scotch publican was able, if he liked, to keep his house open for 20 out of the 24 hours of Sunday, the only hours during which he was bound to close being the hours of public worship—from 11 to 1 and 2 to 4. Now, he understood the publicans in Ireland could only keep their houses open for seven hours on Sunday at present. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) was pleased, in support of his argument, to make certain statements in reference to Scotland. But one part of the hon. Member's statement completely upset the other, for while he contended that drunkenness had increased since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, he forgot that drunkenness could not be produced without whisky or some other intoxicating drink. If, then, there was more whisky consumed now than before the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, where was the grievance of the publican? People could not get whisky by dipping a pitcher into a running stream. They must go to the dealers and buy it. If, therefore, it had been a consequence of the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act that more trade was now done in the six days than was formerly done in seven, Parliament, instead of having done the publicans any harm, had been their benefactor by liberating them, and their families and servants, from labour one day in seven, and yet letting them enjoy the same income as before the change took place. The hon. Member had quoted, from a newspaper published in the city he (Mr. M'Laren) represented, an assertion that drunkenness and the consumption of spirits had greatly increased in Scotland since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act. It might be true—and he (Mr. M'Laren) believed it was true—that on other days of the week than Sunday there were more police cases than there were before the passing of that Act; and, for anything he knew, it might also be the fact that there was more whisky consumed than before the passing of the Act. But account must be taken of the increase of population. The population of Edinburgh before the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act was about 161,000, and now it was about 217,000. Thus, while there had been an increase of more than 50,000 in the population, there had been comparatively little increase in the amount of drink consumed, and not a great increase in the number of police cases arising from it. But the question was not a comparison of the absolute number of cases with a small population and with a large population, but the proportion which the cases bore to the population at the different periods; and if they took that test, they would probably find that there had been rather a diminution in the amount of drinking in Scotland since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act. There was a more striking example in the case of Glasgow. It was said there were more cases of drunkenness in Glasgow now than before the passing of that Act; but the population of Glasgow had within that time increased by 200,000. Did those 200,000 persons drink no whisky, produce no police cases, and was profligacy unknown amongst them? They must make it a question of proportion, and if they did this they would probably find that there was less drunkenness and fewer police cases now than before the public-houses were closed on Sundays in Scotland. The more they examined into the subject, the more manifest would they find the benefits of the Act. There was another qualification which the hon. Members left out of sight altogether, and which it was indispensable to include in any fair compromise. It was well known that the workmen, having had exceptionally prosperous times and high wages within the last few years, had spent a great proportion of those wages in drink; whereas, in times prior to the recent commercial prosperity, the wages were lower, and they were not able to spend so much as they had recently done in that way. This was proved by the fact that the Excise Returns had been falling off during the present year, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) was consequently alarmed at the extent of the decrease in the Revenue. Had this arisen from the spread of temperance principles? By no means; it had arisen from the fact that the workmen had not now so much money to buy drink with as they had in recent years. This point was one of great importance in arriving at a safe conclusion on this class of questions. He would not enter further into the subject, as he sympathized with the Speaker, who had been in the Chair so long, and he (Mr. M'Laren) would not be a party to prolonging that cruelty towards him by continuing the discussion.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY believed that the time for opposition to the Bill had passed away. He had himself been an opponent of the Bill; but those who opposed it had lost opportunities in the earlier phases of its introduction and discussion in this House for opposing it more effectually than was possible now. He had lately regarded the passing of this Bill as a foregone conclusion, and consequently had avoided occupying the time of the House to no purpose. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth) had raised a very important question in the right of the sellers of drink to be recompensed for the loss of a portion of their trade, which was a question affecting not only the sellers, but also those engaged in the production of the drink. It was, however, a question which could not be fully discussed on the third reading of this Bill, as it would require far more time than was likely now to be devoted to its consideration. It had, too, been neglected when the Bill was before the House earlier in the Session, and at this late period was only now presented in its full light. If a division were taken on the question now, it could not well be re-opened at a future time. He suggested to the hon. Member for Westmeath that he would better serve the purposes of justice, and better carry into effect any claim which might underlie his Motion, by not now proposing to take a division on the point. The Bill ought to be allowed to be read a third time, and next Session a Committee might be moved for to inquire into the foundation of this claim, which was made on behalf of the people whose trade was proposed to be diminished by the Bill.

Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN: I have no desire to resume this moribund discussion. I believe it to be impossible to carry out successfully any opposition to this Bill. A large number of Members of this House owe their places to a trade agitation, and it seems to me that a large number of them who have felt galled at being returned to Parliament by such an influence have taken the first opportunity of showing a kind of mock independence of all trade interests; and that, caring little for Irish peasants and Irish citizens, they have rushed forward with the highly moral sentiments that have so much distinguished them in the course of this Bill, but which were not exhibited by them at the hustings during the elections of 1874, to assist in ensuring its passing. I should have thought that in a question of such great social import they would have examined it a little, and that they would have exhibited the true qualities of statesmanship by extending their views to England as well as to Ireland. They have not done this; but, the Bill being an Irish Bill, they have, perhaps, proceeded on the safe maxim, Fiat experimentum in corpore vile. They have determined to try their nostrum in Ireland—but with what intention? First, they asked a number of enthusiasts in that country, whose honesty I have never impugned, their views on this subject; but, instead of asking the people who were to be affected by it, they said—"No, there is an hon. Gentleman at the head of the temperance society in such and such a place; there is another gentleman who presides over the Sabbath arrangements in such and such another place in the North of Ireland; and another gentleman who directs the movements of the Presbyterian body in another place. These are the gentlemen we will inquire of, and we will disregard the humble man, in whose name we profess to act." I have ventured before to express this opinion in the House. I have said that a time would come when hon. Gentlemen would regret the course they are now taking with this Bill. The whole question seems, at this stage, however, to have practically resolved itself into a pure question of trade; and, that being so, the House did surely feel that if it interferes with any vested interest, it should have a fair regard for that interest. Instead of that, what do we see, however? The hon. Gentlemen who represent in England the publican's interest are conspicuous by their absence. There is not a borough in Yorkshire, or in London, or in the South of England, interested in the present Bill, that would not look around in vain for its supporters of the interests of the trade. My hon. Friend who has just spoken has advised the adjournment of the question he has raised to the limbo of a coming Session for investigation by an impossible Committee. I would say to my hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath, however, if he means business, that if he can find only three Members to follow him into the Lobby, to insist upon a division upon the equitable principles he wishes to assert. He should do so, if only to protest against the principle of this Bill in that respect. Many times have I known the same demand made when the Land Question has been under consideration. We had the demands for compensation from owners of land. They said—"Is the British Parliament not going to pay us what we gave for our properties? Remember what we did for maintaining British interests and British opinion. Give us something for our interest, which is of great value." Well, my hon. Friend near me has made that appeal for a much smaller interest, and he is told to pass it by as something not worth discussion. It may not be worth discussion—probably it is not—but it is worth a division, and if my hon. Friend goes to a division I shall heartily support him.

Mr. SHAW: Sir, I have felt it my duty to protest against this Bill at every stage, and I protest against it now, at its final one in this House—against its principle, and against its conception. I agree with the hon. Gentleman who has last spoken in advising the hon. Mover of the Amendment to go to a division upon it. I advise him to do so, because it will show that in persisting in their intention of putting their hands into the poor man's pocket the promoters of this Bill will not listen to reason or justice. This Bill, instead of bearing the title it does, should be entitled "A Bill for Promoting the Domestic Consumption of Liquor in Ireland." In Scotland, the effect of the very same measure has been to increase private drinking in the homes of the people. I know Ireland well, and whisky is an expensive article for the common people, who can only use it on exceptional occasions. On ordinary days I have found it impossible to get it in country public-houses; but the effect of this Bill would be to drive the people into the habit of whisky drinking, and to check the use of beer as an article of growing consumption in the South of Ireland. If the Government had told us that they meant to take up this Bill, we should have known where we were, and we might have fought it out. They did not do that, but said they would "give facilities" for it. We now see, however, that if only the requisite pressure can be brought to bear on the Treasury Bench they will do anything. I never remember so much time wasted on any Bill before, and all for the want of decision on the part of those who conduct Public Business in this House. I have myself a right to complain. The Local Courts of Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill has been thrown overboard for this wretched bit of sentimentality, which the Irish people have not asked for, and which they will fling from themselves with disgust as soon as they come to understand it. There is also the Grand Juries Bill, a Bill of the greatest importance to Ireland, which has been lost for the hours and the days which have been wasted upon this abortion of a Bill. I strongly advise my hon. Friend to go to a division upon his Motion, though I shall not attach much importance to the mere numerical result.

Mr. MURPHY: Sir, it is not my intention to detain the House with any lengthened observations in relation to the Motion now before it, the more so as the part I have taken in this Bill is already well known, and, perhaps, too well known, to many hon. Members. I do not think, indeed, that I could say very much in reference to it without stating again many things which I have already said on the subject; but I cannot help saying that I think, as regards the whole course of this Bill, and in relation to the conduct of it during the last two years, Her Majesty's Government should have given some certain indication as to what that conduct would have been. If, in 1876, without any facts before them, or anything from the promoters to induce them to affirm the principle of the Bill, Her Majesty's Government, who voted against it at that time, had said they objected to it, and would continue to object to it, that would have been all very well that Session. But it would be in the recollection of the House that when, at the end of that Session, the hon. Member in charge of the Bill got up and asked the Government for facilities for passing its second reading, the right hon. Baronet the then Chief Secretary for Ireland said emphatically—

> "We cannot see, at this period of the Session, that it is possible to do anything of the kind. All I can say is, that if between this and the next Session of Parliament the Government do consider this matter, they will consider the whole subject de novo."

In 1877, when the Bill was again brought in, we saw how the Government had re-considered the Bill. It was referred to a Committee to consider the propriety of exempting five principal towns from its operation, although the Chief Secretary had previously intimated that all towns exceeding 10,000 inhabitants should be exempted. Without any inquiry, without entering into any possible investigation as to how the rest of the country was to be treated, the Committee confined the inquiry altogether to these five towns, and the Government then said—"If our Amendments are accepted, we shall give facilities for the passing of the Bill." I do not think that the course adopted has been consistent or logical. If the exemption was good, it was good for all; if it was bad, it was bad for all. I will not trouble the House further on this subject. Let me now say that what I rise for principally is to enter my protest against the passing of this Bill in any shape. I wish to renew my protest against the principle enunciated by this Bill, which has not been asked for by those whom it affects. The Bill notoriously proceeds from an organized confederacy, not belonging to the Irish people, but apart from, and separated from them. This is a measure begotten, I believe, under a combination of self-interest, misinformation, and misdirected zeal, brought forth in an atmosphere of self-complacency, and nurtured and fed and swollen into preposterous dimensions by an artificial pabulum miscalled "public opinion;" created, manufactured, and manipulated by the well-paid zeal of officials, and of the peripatetic stipendiary Apostles of an organized confederacy. It is not a measure emanating from the Irish people, or asked for by them. It is a measure, on the contrary, that is certain to be received by them with soreness and indignation, a measure that will be evaded, a measure that is not defended even by its own promoters, and which the House is not asked to pass as an ordinary measure in the ordinary way, but a measure which has been pressed forward on the one single representation that it was called for by the people of Ireland. I shall not now go into the proofs I have given over and over again that Sunday is the day on which there is least intemperance in Ireland; next, that this Bill would not, even if Sunday was the day of the greatest intemperance, attain the ends it has in view; and, thirdly, that so far from the mass of the Irish people desiring the Bill, it is notorious that the very contrary is the fact. Not the least attempt has been made to answer the objections I have urged against this Bill. The only argument I have heard on the part of those who support it is—"Why should a minority dare to defeat and control a majority?" An observation has been made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) with regard to the working of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, and I am sorry the hon. Member is not now in his place to hear my reply to him. Everyone knows that the advocates of Sunday closing passed that measure, not so much with the hope of restraining Sunday drunkenness, but professedly with a view of lessening the drinking habits of the people by making a break in the week during which drink would not be accessible. That desire, of course, was quite apart from the traditional respect of the Scottish people for Sunday. Now, an increase had taken place in the amount of drink in Scotland since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, and the hon. Member for Edinburgh excused it by arguing that though the amount of drinking has increased, it has increased in a smaller ratio than the population. But I have in my hand the Report of the Grocers' Licensing (Scotland) Committee, laid before the House on the 26th of March last, and that Report states that there has been an increase of drunkenness throughout Scotland; and though that increase may be to some extent explained by the increase of population, as it has not increased in proportion to the increase of population, yet it has increased in certain places where the population has decreased. Now, I want to know how, with statistics picked out of one place and out of another place, it can be contended against such an authority that, notwithstanding the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, drunkenness has not increased in Scotland? What, indeed, are we to argue from these authorities, but that Sunday closing has not in any way tended to lessen the evil against which it was aimed? But I have figures here for the City of Glasgow which are absolutely startling. In the year 1854 the population of Glasgow was 360,000, and the number of persons arrested for drunkenness was 13,616. In the year 1874 the population had increased to 550,000, and the number of persons arrested to 30,606. Thus, while the population had not nearly doubled in the interval, the number of arrests for drunkenness had far more than doubled. I protest against this Bill, because I do not think that a Bill brought in by a private Member, and originated by means which I shall not refer to, has not received the consideration which it ought to do from Her Majesty's Government before they gave such extraordinary facilities for its passing, and also because they have not been made aware of the feelings of the Irish people on the subject. I agree that in the North of Ireland the people of the upper and middle classes are in favour of it. The Presbyterian and Scotch Sabbatarian element is also a powerful element of the support it has received, and the bulk of the educated classes of the North are anxious for the outward observance of the Sabbath. But that is no reason to justify the passing of a sumptuary law like this, which is not suited to the habits of the people—a law which cannot and will not be observed by them, and against which they have protested over and over again. I have only further to say that the opposition to this Bill has been founded on a deep sense of its unjust and arbitrary character, and that so small a number of hon. Members as constitute the minority would not have dared to raise such an opposition to it had they not felt themselves backed by the feelings of the people. What the effect of this Bill will be time will show; and if, as I apprehend, its consequences will be unfortunate, that it will increase rather than decrease drunkenness among the people, I cannot conceive that its present promoters and supporters will resist the demand for its repeal.

Mr. ONSLOW: Sir, the opponents of this Bill have now raised as strong a protest against its passing as, in my own judgment, I think is right; and, having done so, I would urge on those hon. Gentlemen who, like myself, are opposing it, to allow a division to be come to at once, and though, of course, we shall be beaten, yet it will be an indication that to the very last we had not changed our views. It is very hard that we should have to come here to-day, and we must all feel that the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair has been subjected to very great inconvenience. It is impossible for us, however, consistently with the views we hold with regard to this Bill, to give even an implied sanction to it. Her Majesty's Government have taken a very unusual course in allowing it to be taken to-day at all. We discussed that question last night, however, and I am not going to resume it now. I have not opposed the Bill in view of the interests of any particular class of the community. I wish once more to state that most distinctly. I have not taken up the cudgels merely on behalf of the publican interest, though I know that has been the reason alleged, and no doubt will be alleged, outside this House. I have opposed it on the higher ground of its being a coercive and restrictive measure, affecting exclusively the middle and lower classes of society; and as long as I have a seat in this House I shall oppose to the utmost of my powers a Bill which I consider so pernicious in its character. I think it is as bad a Bill as I have ever known introduced; but, at the same time, it is due to the dignity of the House and of the Chair that this debate should not be further protracted; and I would, therefore, earnestly ask hon. Gentlemen not to go on fighting the Bill any longer, but, having made the strongest protest against it in their power, to allow a division to be taken on the question at once.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE HAMPSHIRE RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Viscount BURY said, that he had to ask their Lordships' indulgence while he made an explanation in regard to something that occurred the other night. It would be in their Lordships' recollection that a noble Lord, who was not then in his place (Lord Truro), asked him a Question in regard to the conduct of the commanding officer of a battalion of the Hampshire Volunteers towards the adjutant of that regiment, Captain

Cope. Their Lordships would always treat with indulgence any noble Lord when he addressed them upon a subject that involved the honour of one of Her Majesty's officers, and, therefore, there was no necessity to vindicate the conduct of the noble Lord who had brought this subject before them, and who, he was glad to see, had now entered the House. In the course of his remarks the other night, in answer to the noble Lord, who accused the War Office of having acted with undue harshness towards Adjutant Cope, he made use of the following words, which would be in the recollection of their Lordships. He said—"He was bound to add that if any error in judgment had been committed, it was not in the direction of undue severity towards Captain Cope. If Captain Cope had been an adjutant of a Regular regiment instead of a Volunteer corps, he would decidedly have been brought to a court martial, and in all probability cashiered." By using those words, "he would have been brought to a court martial, and in all probability would have been cashiered," he (Viscount Bury) had, he regretted to say, wounded the feelings of Sir William Cope, the father of Adjutant Cope, who was himself a distinguished soldier, and whose feelings he would be the last man to wish to wound. He begged, therefore, if their Lordships would allow him, to recall those words; and he did so the more readily because he was giving the substance, as he believed, although not the exact words of the Report of the General Officer commanding the district (General Garvock), who had investigated the circumstances of the case. He had found, on subsequent reference, that those words, "tried by court martial and cashiered," did not appear in the General Officer's Report. He might have contented himself—and he regretted that he did not—with quoting the exact words which the commanding officer used. Those words were—

> "Were Captain Cope in the position of an ordinary adjutant of a Regular regiment there would be, as it seems to me, no difficulty in coming to a decision. He would, I think, merit the severest punishment for disobedience to orders and contempt of his commanding officer; but I understand an adjutant of Volunteers holds a different position."

He (Viscount Bury) made no comment on the last branch of the sentence, with which he could not say he altogether agreed, nor did the officers whom he had the honour to represent; but as regards the words which he desired to recall, he would, if their Lordships permitted him, substitute the words used by the General Officer commanding the district, and he regretted very much that he should have given pain to Sir William Cope by the use of those words which he had employed.

LORD TRURO said, he was quite certain Sir William Cope would appreciate the course that had been taken by the noble Viscount. He thought it but due to the War Department to say that if he had been informed of the real circumstances of the case he should have certainly dealt with it in a different manner to that in which he had. He had received a letter from Sir William Cope upon the subject, and he thought it but right to reply to it, stating that, in his humble judgment, the War Office had no alternative but to adopt the course they had pursued, and he was obliged to add that he thought, on the whole, his son was entirely in the wrong.

LOCOMOTIVES ON HIGHWAYS (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 271.)

(The Lord President.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE presented a numerously-signed Petition from the Magistrates and Commissioners of Police of the Burgh of Govan, pointing out that in the English Act there was a clause the object of which was to secure the consumption of smoke by the locomotive engines travelling on the roads. In other respects he believed that the same provision was applicable, so far as Scotland was concerned, but the words were not inserted in this Bill. He should, therefore, with the permission of their Lordships, propose to insert them after the Bill had been read a third time.

Bill read $3^a$ (according to Order).

THE EARL OF REDESDALE then moved the insertion of words in Clause 5 rendering it compulsory the use of engines that would, as far as practicable, consume their own smoke, and imposing penalties for breach of the enactment. The noble Earl stated that the Amendment was in accordance with the prayer of the Petition that he had just presented to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Lord DENMAN, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, and which was the same as that which had been rejected in the Committee, pointed out that it might be necessary to stop the locomotives for a longer period of time during the summer and autumn than in the spring or winter, and stated that it would not do any injury whatever to the owners of locomotives. He hoped the noble Duke would be able to give a more favourable answer to this question; because, from the much greater number of locomotives in parts of Scotland than in any county of England, there was no necessity for dealing with the Scotch roads in the same manner as the English.

The Duke of RICHMOND and GORDON said, that he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed; and sent to the Commons.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

OBSERVATIONS.

Lord TRURO rose, pursuant to Notice, to make some observations in regard to the Metropolitan Police Force. He begged to remind the House that when, upon a former occasion, he was about to do so, he was met by an objection from the noble Duke opposite that he was committing a breach of the Rules of the House by introducing the subject without having given Notice. Knowing the great latitude that was permitted in their Lordships' House, he did not think he was much in the wrong, because, in his view, irregularity was rather the rule of the House than otherwise; but finding that he was he had now given Notice, in order to set himself right with the House. In bringing forward this question, he should commence with the same words that he used on the former occasion—namely, that Her Majesty's Government being a Conservative Government, and following the traditions of all Conservative Governments, had exercised its natural instincts by never moving in the direction of the reform of any institution until it was thoroughly convinced that it absolutely required it. The reason that he made that very common-place observation was that when a Conservative Government did move he thought they might be well assured that there were very good grounds for that movement, and that with respect to the Metropolitan Police they might be well assured that any steps that might be taken towards its reform would not be taken without a thorough and searching inquiry. This matter of the Metropolitan Police had been before their Lordships once or twice during the last Session, and he did not propose to trouble them at any length; but he must apologize for the somewhat desultory nature of the remarks which he should venture to offer. Inasmuch as Her Majesty's Government had considered it proper to appoint a Committee to inquire into the reorganization of the Metropolitan Police Force, he thought it would be expedient to draw their attention to one or two general remarks previous to that Committee commencing its labours. Now, if there was one thing more important than another in relation to that Department it was that the heads of the Office should be men of vigour and energy, of experience, and of sound discretion; but, above all, what was absolutely essential for the management and control of such a Department was vigour and energy. It was a somewhat remarkable circumstance that in the Metropolitan Police Department there was no arrangement for compulsory retirement similar to that which was provided, always to the great advantage of the public, in other public Departments. In this there was no provision for men to retire at all, and, he believed, no pension. He could not help thinking that in these days, when in the whole of our great Public Departments they looked to the age of 60 years as being that at which, in the interest of the public service, men should retire from active service, it did seem extraordinary that the Metropolitan Police Department should be without that most reasonable provision. Taking all the Departments of the State there was, perhaps, not one which so much necessitated the possession in their full activity of the mental and bodily powers. Yet he believed that two out of the three gentlemen at the head of that Department were now verging on the age of 70. What the age of the other distinguished officer might be he did not undertake to say; but it must be obvious to their Lordships that the age of 70 was one but little suited to the requirements of such an office as the control of the Metropolitan Police Department. He would remind their Lordships that that Department had much more to do than the mere control of the police of the Metropolis, it being in constant connection, or if not constant, to a very great extent in connection with, similar Departments all over the country; and when their Lordships remembered that it involved constant correspondence with the police authorities of such cities as Bristol, Birmingham, Liverpool, and the like, they must confess the amount of labour that was thrown upon the Department must be immense. He, therefore, threw out for the consideration of the Committee on the re-organization of the Department, whether it was not desirable to take this matter into consideration; and, first of all, whether the gentlemen who were at the head of the Department were still endowed with the energy that was necessary to enable them to discharge the duties of the office, and, if not, whether it was not desirable in the interests of the public, as well as in the interests of the present heads themselves, who had served the public honestly and faithfully for many years, and were therefore entitled to, and no doubt would receive, the most liberal consideration on the part of the Government, should not retire, and make room for men who, being younger, must necessarily possess more bodily vigour? He now wished to make one observation in reference to the Departments themselves. They very often heard men talk about "time-honoured Departments;" but if there were time-honoured Departments, he must remind their Lordships that very frequently they were time-worn Departments, and time-worn Departments were often very proper objects of attack on the part of those who wished to see reforms carried into effect. Departing from that portion of the subject, he would call the attention of their Lordships to the fact that within the last few weeks there had been rumours of the existence of great discontent among the members of the Police Force themselves. The Committee which had been appointed would, no doubt, use their discretion in judging of the reasonableness of those complaints. They were three in number, two of which had been brought prominently before the public; but the third, which had not been mentioned, was, perhaps, the greatest grievance of the three. The one that was most prominent was the question of increased pay. Now, that was not so easy to deal with as they might imagine, for this reason. The ground on which the demand for increased pay was put forward was, that lodgings were so expensive. Now, as their Lordships knew, the area over which the police operated was very extensive, and it would be absurd to suppose that it was so expensive to live in the suburban districts as in those which he called the inner circle. Apart from that, he knew, as a fact, that in the inner districts of the Metropolis care was taken to have the most experienced, the most able, and the most energetic men; and, that being so, he considered the demands made by policemen in that district were entitled to greater weight than those which were made by the suburban police. But, on behalf of the public, it seemed to him that great discrimination should be used in dealing with this matter. They all knew that in public companies and large institutions, where there were a considerable number of men justly entitled by their superior ability and the circumstances in which they were placed to ask for a larger salary, yet it was the constant practice of the most incompetent to make a demand for higher payment. In some cases such a demand was complied with; but when the head of the firm or the manager of the company was a man of firmness as well as discretion, the first application was invariably refused, and it was only after repeated applications that the demand, in other cases, was granted when it was considered that the persons who made it were worthy of it. He could not help thinking that the public would be very unwise if they were led away by the notion that the men were underpaid, except in particular districts, and especially in what he had termed the inner circle of London. He reminded their Lordships that the expenses necessarily incurred by the Police Force were infinitely less in the suburbs than they were in the central parts of the Metropolis; while, at the same time, the men employed were, as a rule, of a superior character, and possessed of more ability. On that ground he did not object to their application for an increase of pay being carefully considered. Leaving for a moment the question of increased pay to the Police Force, he would just touch upon another point —namely, that which he might term the lodging question. As their Lordships were aware, there was recently an Act of Parliament passed, entitled the "Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act," the object of which was that when large areas were cleared for Metropolitan improvements, provision should be made by the surveyors and architects who laid out the improvement schemes, to build houses sufficient for the accommodation of the population which had been displaced. He was aware that this Act had no direct bearing upon the question of the accommodation of the police; but he would suggest to their Lordships what had been suggested to him by men of great experience — namely, whether it would not be expedient to make use of the powers of this Act of Parliament to provide lodgings for the police in the shape of police barracks in those large areas in which it was proposed to build houses for the accommodation of the people who were displaced? He put it to them, whether it did not appear to be a most impolitic thing to mass together from 3,000 to 5,000, perhaps, of the class of persons who would be removed from their dwellings under this Act in one spot, without having some place provided for the police? Surely, it was not for the safety of the community at large that such bodies of people of this class should be massed together without any police control, merely because the existing sites upon which they lived had become more valuable and obtained higher rents than formerly? In his opinion, wherever the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act was brought into operation, police barracks for the accommodation of a certain number of both the single and married policemen should be erected. Even if this were not done, care might be taken to provide lodgings for the police in these districts at a small rent, and in some degree proportionate to their pay. There was another question which he thought was well deserving of the consideration of the Committee which had been appointed, and that was a re-adjustment of the night labour. At present, a policeman went on duty at 9 o'clock every night for a week together for 9 hours; and he could not help thinking that such continuous night work was injurious to the men, although he had heard it alleged that going on duty for three days and three nights alternately would affect the health of the policeman still more detrimentally than their going on night duty for a whole week. At all events, the Committee might inquire whether this was one of the causes of their discontent. The substantial grievance he looked upon with most concern was the fact that there was neither any pension or fixed period of retirement for the men; the result of which was, that they might serve the country most efficiently and faithfully for 25, 30, or even 40 years, and then, when they became old and unfit for further service, they might be turned adrift without any retiring pension whatever. His own view was in accordance with the practice which prevailed in the public Departments generally, that an officer should retire with a pension at 60. Leaving that portion of the subject, he would refer to another, which would, perhaps, interest the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and that was the necessity for altering the law with a view to give the police more protection than it at present gave them. It would, perhaps, rather surprise their Lordships when he told them that last year there were no less than 2,941 assaults on the Metropolitan Police Force; and he had it on good authority that in the previous year the assaults on the police numbered 2,894, some of them being of a very severe character. He, therefore, thought it but reasonable that some further protection should be afforded to them than they at present possessed. He need hardly mention any individual cases; but he thought that when medical students, coming out of a dancing saloon, considered it good fun to half knock the eye out of a policeman, it was time to give them some increased protection. There was very little punishment awarded to those who considered it good fun to strike a policeman, but who would regard it as the reverse of fun if a policeman struck them. He could not help thinking that stringent regulations were necessary to protect those whose duty it was to protect the public. He knew very well that many persons were apt to discredit the reports of the assaults made on the police, and it was on that account that he had stated the number of them; but, if the truth were known, that number was very much understated. He thought the best remedy for this evil was altogether to abolish fines, and substitute imprisonment for the offence of assaulting the police. With regard to the complaints of the police, he would like to say one or two words more with relation to the disadvantages under which they laboured in respect to the detection of crime. He did not think that their Lordships could be aware how extremely loose and defective the Metropolitan Police Act was with reference to pawnbrokers; and in looking into this subject he had obtained a copy of the Glasgow Police Act; and the perusal of that had convinced him that their Scotch neighbours had been more far-seeing than themselves, and they had taken care to introduce into their Police Act powers not only for the detection of crime and the arrest of suspected persons, but with reference to pawnbrokers, marine store dealers, and dealers in metals. In London, pawnbrokers were almost able to defy the law, and gave the police more trouble than any other class. He did not know whether their Lordships were aware of the fact, but there were a great many respectable pawnbrokers who were in the habit of keeping a melting-pot ready for the purpose of defacing and destroying plate, so as to prevent its identification, and not long ago he heard of an officer who wished to sell a gold epaulet, who was told by his tailor that if he would only wait two or three minutes he would go to a pawnbroker, get it melted, tell him the exact value, and give him the money. He thought it most discreditable that pawnbrokers should keep melting-pots ready to melt down stolen goods. He had even heard of a melting-pot being kept in a cab, and things being stolen at one end of the street being melted and defaced at the other in the cab. He was, therefore, of opinion that the whole of the law relating to the disposition of goods in the hands of pawnbrokers should be narrowly scrutinized. By the Glasgow Police Act power was given to enter dwellings on suspicion, but no such power existed in the Metropolitan Police Act. He thought it extremely desirable that there should be; and he heartily commended the subject to the attention of the Committee, being quite convinced that it would be for the advantage of the community if the police had power to enter houses from which any disorderly noises issued, or where they suspected any person who had committed a penal offence was harboured, and he assured their Lordships that those provisions had been found to be extremely effective in Glasgow. There was also a clause in the Police Act of 1866 which affected the pawnbrokers to the same extent, but he would not trouble their Lordships by reading it. While he sincerely congratulated the Government on the step which they had taken in the appointment of the Committee, he hoped it was only the prelude to the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole question of the Metropolitan Police, and see by what means they could be placed upon a more satisfactory and permanent basis. If the Government did not move for the issue of this Commission, he should do so himself. He desired inquiry particularly as regarded the relations between the city and borough and the county police. The jealousy which now existed between those bodies rendered it most difficult to discharge the duties efficiently; and, unless the police power could be concentrated in such a way as to act upon the whole country, they would not have such a force as they were entitled to. The relations at present existing were such as to prevent the detection of crime.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in the first place, acknowledged the compliment which the noble Lord in the outset of his remarks was good enough to pay to Her Majesty's Government, when he said that being a Conservative Government they were not in the habit of meddling with matters merely for the sake of interference, but that when real grievances were proved to exist they were both willing and desirous to inquire into them, and if possible provide a remedy. He apologized to the noble Lord if he thought that on a former occasion he acted with any want of courtesy in requesting him to postpone the remarks he was then commencing to make as being of an irregular character. He made that request because he considered it desirable that their Lordships should have some notice that the noble Lord intended to make observations on a subject which was of the very greatest importance to every person in the country. Therefore, he had looked at to-day's Notice Paper, to see what line of argument the noble Lord was about to enter upon; but he found only the very modest statement that the noble Lord would make some "observations" about the Metropolitan Police Force. He confessed reading that Notice did not prepare him for the very vast and wide subject upon which the noble Lord had entered. He would not, however, quarrel with the noble Lord, for perhaps, to a certain extent, his observations came within the terms of the Notice he had placed upon the Paper. His reply to those observations might be postponed until next Session; because the noble Lord had told them that he intended to re-open the whole subject next year by moving for the appointment of a Royal Commission. Now, the remarks of the noble Lord might be divided into two heads. First of all those which affected the Police Force itself, and those which referred to its organization and the gentlemen who were connected with the head Department. With regard to what had been said respecting the dwellings of the constables, and the Artizans Dwellings Act, that was, no doubt, a subject which would be considered by the Committee which had recently been appointed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. They would be certain to enter upon an inquiry of that kind. And, again, as to the number of assaults committed upon members of the Police Force, no one could look upon them without expressing his horror at what the men were subject to, and it was worthy of consideration whether the law required to be further strengthened on that point. He guarded himself from saying that it would be possible to carry out anything of that kind; what he wished to say was, that it was a matter which could not altogether escape observation. Then, if the powers of search possessed by the police were not sufficient to enable them to properly discharge their arduous duties—duties which, in his opinion, they performed in a highly creditable manner—it might be desirable to increase those powers. The noble Lord had made some remarks about the pawnbrokers and marine store dealers, and he could not agree in his account of what he called a "respectable" pawnbroker, who had a smelting-pot always ready. He should have thought there were pawnbrokers in this city who would be above anything of that kind; and if they were guilty of such a thing they certainly would not come under the category of "respectable." And now as to the constitution of the head Department of the Police. The noble Lord found fault that the gentlemen who were connected with that Department—Sir Edmund Henderson, Captain Harris, and Colonel Labalmondiere — were men verging on 60 years of age.

LORD TRURO said, he never mentioned the name of Sir Edmund Henderson, and he stated that it had not been considered desirable to retain gentlemen in public Departments when they were near 70 years of age.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, if the noble Lord had not alluded to Sir Edmund Henderson, he must have referred to the two other gentlemen, and his argument respecting them was scarcely borne out by the facts in this and other cases. The eyes of the country had recently been directed to the Conference which had been going on in Germany, and he thought both Prince Gortchakoff and Prince Bismarck were nearer 70 than 60. The noble Lord would probably know the age of Mr. Gladstone, and he (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) was aware of the age of his noble Friend (the Earl of Beaconsfield), and none of those gentlemen, certainly not his noble Friend, showed any want of vigour or energy in the performance of the arduous duties imposed upon them; and if gentlemen of their age could carry out what they did, it was rather hard to say that the two gentlemen to whom he alluded in the head Department of the Police Force were not fit to carry out their work because of their age. He should not enter further into the subject. He had made these observations out of courtesy to the noble Lord; and he still adhered to the opinion that those who were at the head of the Metropolitan Police Force were perfectly competent and capable to carry out the duties imposed upon them with zeal and energy. No doubt the other points to which the noble Lord had alluded—such as superannuation, an increase in the powers of search, and the assaults on the police, were matters which were worthy of consideration.

INDIA—THE SALT TAX.—QUESTION.

General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will lay upon the Table the further Papers about levelling down the Bengal Salt Tax, and those, if any, about levelling up the Madras Salt Tax; and, if he will produce Papers to show the details of taxation in Madras, and other parts of India, by which it will be seen, as mentioned in the Financial Statement of 1877 (vide Hansard), that "Bengal is more lightly taxed and richer than any of the other Provinces;" and,

> "under the permanent settlement she (Bengal) paid eight millions less land revenue than she would pay if the land revenues were liable to revision?"

Mr. E. STANHOPE: The House has already ordered, upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), a Return of any Papers relating to the changes in the salt duty made in December last. As regards the recent reduction in Northern India, we have at present no Papers; but I hope to have an opportunity of giving an explanation to-morrow. With respect to the first statement made by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council in his Financial Statement last year, I would refer the hon. and gallant Member to a speech of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, Sir Ashley Eden, in the Legislative Council, on the 27th of December, 1877, in which he described Bengal as advancing rapidly in wealth, and its people as "the most lighty taxed in all India." As to the second quotation made by the hon. and gallant Member, I can only say that it is a point which it is impossible to prove absolutely, and which must be more or less a matter of opinion. But if the statement should be challenged, I am very confident that my noble Friend would give to the House very good reasons for it.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it be true that it is laid down as a general rule that no appointment to a resident magistracy in Ireland is made of persons over forty years of age; if so, how long this rule has been in force?

Mr. J. LOWTHER: It is not the case that any general rule has been laid down on this subject; but it is the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant that, generally speaking, it is not desirable to appoint gentlemen who exceed the age of 40 years.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—PRISON INSPECTORS.—QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to select the Inspectors under the new Prisons Board from the Local Inspectors when they are found efficient?

Mr. J. LOWTHER: There are only three Inspectors of Prisons in Ireland to be appointed under the new Prisons Board. The local Inspectors, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, are a very numerous body, and they will be eligible, like all other persons, as candidates; but it is not the intention of the Government to confine it to them.

INDIA—MYSORE.—QUESTION.

Mr. W. M. TORRENS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If, in compliance with the Despatch of the Secretary of State, 16th April 1867, arrangements have been made for restoring a Native Administration in Mysore, by the time the Maharajah attains his majority in 1880?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: The arrangements have been long in progress for restoring Native rule in Mysore, and, though delayed by the Famine, will be completed in all material respects by the time the Maharajah attains his majority. There will be no objection to the production of the Papers, if the hon. Member will move for them.

CUSTOMS—OUTPORT CLERKS. QUESTION.

Dr. CAMERON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the scheme for the reorganization of the Customs Department, according to which the ordinary terms of retirement under the Superannuation Act of 1859, are offered to the clerks in London, will apply as well to the out-port clerks?

Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I can only repeat what I have already intimated to the House—that there is no intention on the part of the Government to offer to any officers of the Customs, in London or at the outports, terms of retirement other than those under the Act of 1859.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCE. QUESTIONS.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the rumoured advance of Russian forces across the Oxus, or towards Merv?

Mr. C. BECKETT-DENISON: Before the hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I beg to ask him, Whether the Government have any authentic information regarding the reception of a Russian Resident at the Court of Cabul? If the hon. Gentleman cannot answer that Question now, I will repeat it on a future occasion.

Mr. BOURKE: I should feel obliged if my hon. Friend the Member for Yorkshire would ask that Question again, no Notice having been given of it. With respect to the Question of the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), no intelligence has reached the Government that the Russian forces have crossed the Oxus in the direction of Merv.

SCOTCH AND IRISH FISHERY LOAN ACCOUNTS—SECTION 10, 5 GEO. IV., c. 64. QUESTION.

General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the provisions of section 10 of the Act 5 Geo. 4, c. 64, requiring the accounts relating to the loans for Irish and Scotch Fisheries to be laid before Parliament within fourteen days at the commencement of every Session, have not been enforced, with all the details set forth in the named Clause?

Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON in reply, said, that so far as Ireland was concerned, the section referred to in the Question was repealed by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 106. In regard to Scotland, the information which the hon. and gallant Member seemed to desire always appeared in the Report of the Commissioners of the Fishery Board (Scotland), which was presented annually to Parliament. At all events, he imagined that that Report would furnish the hon. Member with all the information which he required.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—PRISON PILLOWS.—QUESTIONS.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If the pillow which he stated is supplied to prisoners who have to pass the night on a plank is a lump of wood, the same as is used in England, and not a pillow in the usual meaning of the term; and, if that is so, whether he will state by whom he was informed that prisoners were supplied with a pillow?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have confined my inquiries on this subject to Irish prisons, and I find that the information which I previously furnished to the House was correct. The pillow is made, I am told, of ticking, stuffed with cocoanut fibre, which is, in its turn, further covered with pillow slips, which are changed weekly.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I wish to ask, Has it not been stated to the House, that the Prison Rules are the same in England and Ireland?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I never so stated it, though others may have done. The Rule referring to this subject is drawn up in identical terms; but its application as regards Ireland I have already stated. England is in this matter under the charge of the Home Secretary.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the pillow issued in England to prisoners who sleep on the plank bed is of wood?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Generally speaking, it has been a piece of wood in England; but, at the present moment, as far as women, children, and old men are concerned, orders have been given for some alteration to be made.

CONSULS — CONVENTION WITH THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can state to the House what progress has been made towards the negotiation of a Consular Convention between Great Britain and the United States?

MR. BOURKE: The negotiations, which are exceedingly voluminous, have been going on for some time. No Conventions can be entered into with reference to the powers and privileges of Consuls, until an Act of Parliament has been passed which shall enable Her Majesty's Government to secure to foreign Consuls in this country reciprocal advantages. Several draft Bills for this purpose have been prepared, and have recently been under the consideration of the Foreign Office; but it has been found necessary for various reasons to postpone until next Session the introduction of the proposed measure. I hope, however, that the Foreign Office, or some other Department, will introduce them next Session.

JUDICATURE ACTS—LEEDS ASSIZES.

QUESTION.

MR. BARRAN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, now that it is decided that a Civil Assize in addition to those already held at Leeds is to be established, pleadings are to be made deliverable during the vacation?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): By the 57th Order framed under the Judicature Acts, no pleadings can be either delivered or amended in the Long Vacation, except by the order of the Court or a Judge. With respect, however, to pleadings in cases designed for trial at the Assize intended to be held in October at Leeds, it is clear, I think, that the vacation Judge will give the requisite orders.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)— ACTION FOR LIBEL.—QUESTION.

MR. ISAAC asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the evidence given before Mr. Woodlock, one of the Dublin Divisional Police Magistrates, by a Departmental Committee appointed by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to inquire into the constitution and organization of the Board of Works in Ireland, and deposed to by him in certain criminal proceedings instituted by Mr. Lefroy, manager of the Queen's Printing Office in Dublin, against Mr. Burnside, proprietor of "Saunders' Irish Daily News," to have informations returned for libel; and, whether the manner in which an advance copy of the Departmental Committee's Report was obtained and published is in accordance with the rules and practices of this House, or was approved of by the Chairman and other Members of the Departmental Committee; and, if not, whether any and what steps will be taken to prevent a recurrence of such proceedings, which have already led to litigation and other inconveniences?

Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, I am aware that criminal proceedings have been instituted by the manager of the Queen's Printing Office in Ireland against the proprietor of Saunders's Irish Daily News. The case having been sent forward for trial, the hon. Member will not expect me to make any comments on it pending the decision of a Court of Justice; but I may say that nothing, so far as I am aware, has been done contrary to the Rules of this House or contrary to the approval of any Member of the Committee with whose Report the present proceedings are connected.

CONGRESS OF BERLIN—GREECE.

QUESTION.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have become aware of the intention of the Porte to refuse to arrange with Greece for the rectification of frontiers approved by the Congress of Berlin?

Mr. BOURKE: No, Sir; Her Majesty's Government are not aware of any such intention on the part of the Porte.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: I beg to give Notice that either to-morrow or Wednesday, upon a stage of the Appropriation Bill, I will call attention to the refusal of the Porte to carry out the suggestion of the Congress at Berlin with regard to Greece, which Her Majesty's Government seem to be unaware of.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE FLEET IN THE DARDANELLES.

QUESTION.

Mr. GOURLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will be good enough to inform the House when Her Majesty's Government intend removing the Fleet, now under the command of Admiral Hornby, from the neighbourhood of Constantinople?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The British Fleet will be removed from the neighbourhood of Constantinople at the same time as the Russian Forces are removed, which I hope will be soon.

NAVY—THE CHANNEL AND PARTICULAR SERVICE SQUADRONS.

QUESTION.

Mr. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, The nature of the summer sea-going manœuvres, in which the officers and men of the Channel and Reserve Squadrons have been exercised; if they have been exercised in the working of submarine, harbour, and sea-going torpedoes, and in the landing of men, guns, and stores, and other duties incident to a state of war; and, if the officers have been practically educated in procuring a knowledge of coast navigation on both shores of the English Channel, North Sea, and Baltic?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I have not, Sir, been able to refer to the Commanders-in-Chief of these Fleets in order to ascertain the particulars which the hon. Member asks for; but the Channel Squadron has done good duty in the Mediterranean during the last three months, and its services are well known through the medium of the Press. Both the Commanders-in-Chief of the Mediterranean and also of the Particular Service Squadrons are officers of distinguished merit, who thoroughly well know how to exercise their men and their ships in all the evolutions incident to warfare; and I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Admiralty—and I think this House also—have perfect confidence in these officers.

Mr. GOURLEY said, that in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, he should call attention to the matter early next Session.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT (1876) AMENDMENT BILL.

QUESTION.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS (for Mr. Mellor) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering that this House on two occasions has unanimously insisted on disagreeing to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Poor Law Amendment Act (1876) Amendment Bill, he can explain the position in which the Bill now stands; and, whether he can state if any, and what, steps should be be taken to bring about its reconsideration by the Lords?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sorry to say that the state of this matter has now become such that its further re-consideration appears to be impossible. The Bill has been twice before this House, and twice this House has agreed to disagree with the Lords' Amendments. The question has been twice argued in the House of Lords, where the Government, I am informed by my Colleagues, did what they could to support the view of the House of Commons, but were outvoted on two occasions; and the Bill is now, I believe, dead. Therefore, I apprehend nothing more can be done in the present Session.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Bill, though not one of the first importance, was one in which a very large number of people took an interest. He was rather surprised to hear that in consequence of the disagreement between the two Houses the Bill came to an end. Generally the result of a disagreement was a Conference. He did not know whether the Government considered the Bill unworthy of a Conference.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think that all I can do is to appeal to the Speaker on a point of Order. No doubt, this matter is one of importance; and, as far as the Government is concerned, we should be anxious to give the Bill any chance of being accepted by the House of Lords. If it is in accordance with the Rules of Parliament that a Conference between the two Houses should be held, that course might be followed.

MR. SPEAKER: Upon the Motion of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill (Mr. Mellor), the House insisted on disagreeing with the Lords' Amendments, and thereupon the Bill was dropped. If the hon. Member had thought proper he could have invited the House to appoint a Conference; but on neither occasion when the Lords' Amendments were before the House was such a course taken.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Sir Matthew Ridley.)

[BILL 296.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, who had the following Motion on the Paper:—

> "That this House regrets that legislation with regard to Corrupt Practices at Elections has not taken place in the course of the present Session," said, he did not, under the circumstances, intend to move his Resolution; but he would point out that this Bill contained a renewal of the Corrupt Practices Act now in force. Last year he had called attention to the negligence of Her Majesty's Government in relation to Corrupt Practices at Elections. During the present year there had been no legislation on that question, although the hours of polling and the subject of registration had been dealt with. For the last three years they had had promises from the Government on the matter, and not only had those promises been made, but they had been made in very direct terms on three several occasions by the Home Secretary, the Attorney General, and the Leader of the House respectively, and yet the Bill dealing with the subject had not been introduced until the last week of the Session. He did not think that was a proper way of dealing with a large and serious question; and he hoped to receive from the Government a promise of such a character on this occasion that they would be ashamed to meet the House next year without having it carried out. The Bill now before the House proposed to continue in its present objectionable state the law regarding the employment of cabs, when it was notorious that at every Election that law was broken, and the sooner it was made clear the better.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS reminded the House that one of the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1875, which was carried by a majority of 11 to 5, was that Election Petitions should be tried by more than one Judge, and that no seat should be vacated upon an allegation of corrupt practices, except by a decision of two Judges. There were strong reasons for supposing that the Government did not intend to propose a measure to give effect to that recommendation. He wished to call attention to a short Return, from which hon. Members might form their own opinions as to the desirability of leaving the liberties and privileges of constituencies at the mercy of the decisions of Judges from whom there was no appeal. It was a Return showing the number of cases in which the decisions of single Judges in Chancery had been reversed on appeal; and the statistics proved that out of 253 decisions given, between January 1, 1877, and March 4, 1878, only 106 had remained undisturbed by superior Courts. Such, then, was the fallibility of single Judges. It was to be noticed that the Act had been originally passed for only three years; and he thought that now that it had been seven times renewed by a Continuance Bill, in spite of the strongest evidence for its discontinuance, the Government ought to have introduced a measure of reform. He trusted that during the Recess the hon. and learned Attorney General would apply his vigorous and practical mind to the matter.

Mr. O'CONOR called attention to the continuance of the Corrupt Practices Bill. Although it was expected in 1874 that something effectual would be done in the matter of corrupt practices, nothing was attempted, for a new Government came into Office, and the matter was forgotten in the excitement of Election Petitions. Great dissatisfaction was expressed at the inaction of the Government in the matter. In 1875 they promised to introduce a Bill. The promised Bill, however, did not make its appearance that year. Indeed, it was not until the 8th of August, 1876, that a Bill appeared on the subject, and that entirely ignored the chief recommendations of a Select Committee that had sat on the subject. The Home Secretary, who had charge of the Bill, stated that his object in introducing the measure at so late a period of the Session was that it might be considered in the Recess. It was a very comprehensive Bill. It was that Bill which made permanent the system which was established in 1868. Last year he asked the hon. and learned Attorney General whether he intended to introduce the same Bill as the previous year; and he replied that it was the intention of the Government to substantially introduce the same Bill. He (Mr. O'Conor) was, however, astonished to find, after this assurance, that an entirely different Bill was introduced—a Bill, in fact, for continuing for two years more the Act of 1868. That Bill was introduced in May, but never passed the second reading. They had not now any opportunity of discussing the question, and he thought it time that some steps should be taken to put an end to this farce which was going on. He hoped, if the Government did not show greater aptitude next Session, that some private Member would force on the subject by the introduction of a Bill.

Mr. HOPWOOD criticized the continuance of one section of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1861, by which the Government were enabled to appoint Inspectors under the Act. These gentlemen, who were originally appointed for three years, had neither powers nor duties of an important character, and he could not understand why an ineffectual Act should be continued.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir John Holker) said, there could be no doubt that a Committee was appointed in 1875 to consider the whole question, and that they presented a Report; but they were not unanimous except on one point, and on other points their views were not in accord with the opinions of the Government. The Government were, however, convinced that some of the suggestions made by the Committee should be adopted. A promise was certainly made that a Bill should be introduced in 1876, and, if his memory served him, a Bill was introduced at a tolerably early part of the Session; but, owing to the state of Business, it could not be advanced so as to afford an opportunity for having the subject discussed. He promised to re-introduce the measure in the Session of 1877; but a good deal of time was then occupied—he did not care to say how—and his intentions could not be carried into effect. When, he might add, he promised to bring in another Bill this Session, he fully intended to perform that promise; but, owing to circumstances over which he had no control, he was unable to give it practical effect. It was thought right that where a candidate had been guilty of personal bribery, and where that bribery would subject him to grievous penalties under the 43rd section of the Act of 1868, there should be some further remedy given to him, and that he should have an opportunity of appealing, not only upon questions of law, but also upon questions of fact; and he was directed to introduce provisions in the Government Bill to that effect. In consequence of that alteration, and other matters to which he need not refer, he had been unable to fulfil his promise as he should have liked, or to bring forward the Bill until the other day; and if he had done so, no opportunity could have been afforded for discussion on the subject, in consequence of the time which had to be given to the debates on the Eastern Question, and other questions of importance. He would do his best to secure an early discussion on the subject next Session; and when that discussion was obtained, no doubt hon. Gentlemen who entertained strong views on the question would strongly express them. He would further observe that if the Committee were right in the views which they took, the Government were wrong; for, with regard to their principal recommendation—that an Election Petition should in future be tried before two Judges, instead of one—the Government differed from them in opinion, inasmuch as they believed that the present tribunal for the trial of those Petitions had, in the main, worked satisfactorily. It was desirable that cases affecting the seats of Members of Parliament should be disposed of quickly; and, generally speaking, the questions of fact which were raised were exceedingly simple, and there was no difficulty in dealing with them once intelligible principles had been laid down with reference to what did and what did not constitute agency, and some other matters. On questions of law there was an appeal; but he certainly felt—and the feeling was shared by the Government—that where a candidate was pronounced by the decision of an Election Judge to be guilty of personal bribery, and where such a decision entailed on the candidate the loss of his seat and other grievous disabilities and penalties, fixing on him a stigma which might last for life, there ought to be either a tribunal consisting of a greater number of Judges, or, it might be, a jury trial presided over by a Judge, or, what he thought still better, a right of appeal. That appeal the Government measure proposed to give, and he hoped the question would be fully discussed next Session.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD hoped the Government would deal with the matter before a General Election took place, which could not be very far distant. The question was one of very great importance. In other cases of importance, where questions of fact were left to the decision of one Judge, there was invariably an appeal, subject to certain limitations; and surely the question of unseating a Member for personal bribery was one of sufficient importance to justify an appeal even on matters of fact. There would be no difficulty in forming a tribunal which would be satisfactory to the country. He had himself a doubt as to whether two Judges would be better than one, because, when they differed in opinion, the trial would prove inoperative; but he suggested that there might be two Assessors appointed to act with the Judge in trying questions of fact, or that there should be a right of new trial on application to a Court consisting of several Judges—it being necessary, as in other cases, in order to obtain a new trial, to show that the decision in question was against the weight of evidence. What objection could there be to introducing some principle of appeal of that description into the trial of Election Petitions? He hoped the Government would take the matter into their serious consideration, and that the hon. and learned Attorney General would, in the name and on behalf of the Government, promise to introduce and carry a Bill dealing with the subject in the course of next Session.

Mr. BUTT, who had been a Member of the Committee of 1875, said, he would not long take up the time of the House on the subject; but he wished to call attention to the position in which the question now stood. He did think it was a very serious thing to give to one Judge the power of inflicting a penalty in addition to unseating Members, and of disqualifying them from seeking election again in the same Parliament. It was contrary to the general principles of our law. He was very sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was not in his place, because he asked him, in the year 1876, not to resort in future to the expedient of renewing this measure—the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt Practices) Bill—in the ordinary Continuance Bill, but to give the House an opportunity of discussing the subject; and the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was positive—that it would not be placed in the Continuance Bill, but would be put forward in such a shape that the House would have an opportunity of considering the whole question. Were the right hon. Gentleman now present, he

(Mr. Butt) would ask whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce into the Bill one of its provisions to which many hon. Members objected? He would remind the House of a very remarkable instance in connection with this matter. In the year 1874, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) quoted from some declarations of Lord Salisbury which were made in the House of Lords, in which the noble Lord made the strongest protest against this system of renewing important Bills under the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. At that time assurances were given, which amounted to a distinct pledge to the House, that this system of continuing Bills would be dropped, and that no important Bills would be thereby renewed. In 1877, he (Mr. Butt) again asked the right hon. Gentleman a Question on this subject, whether he would then give an assurance on this matter, and the assurance was repeated; and he did now think that before they renewed this Bill for another year they ought to have an assurance, not from the hon. and learned Attorney General, who had the best intentions in regard to this matter, but from the Government, that this Bill would be brought forward early next Session. For himself, he would rather go back to the old system than be subjected to the present Bill, which, he thought, ought to be fairly considered.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT joined in the appeal which had been made to the Government, that they would give some assurance as to this Bill being placed in a different position next Session. He did not attribute any blame to the hon. and learned Attorney General, who had done all he could to redeem his promise; but the question was one of great importance, and ought to be dealt with before the General Election, which could not be very far off. He asked that the Bill might be placed in the first rank of Government measures next Session, with the intention of then re-considering the subject, so that it might not be hung up for an indefinite period.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he was quite ready, on the part of the Government, to give the assurance which was asked for by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). He thought it was undoubtedly a matter which ought not to stand over any longer; and although, of course, there had been a great jostling amongst Bills this Session, and this measure could not be brought forward in time, he thought he could undertake, with a good conscience, that the Government would make it one of their first measures next year.

Mr. MONK wished to remind the House that a promise had been given early in this Session that a Bill for continuing and extending the powers of the Railway Commissioners Act should be brought in this year, and said, that both the Railway Commissioners and the public interested in the matter were extremely anxious that an amending Bill should be brought forward, and that the powers of the Commissioners should not be limited as they were at present. He hoped an assurance would be given that the whole subject would be dealt with next year.

Viscount SANDON said, that the pledges to which the hon. Gentleman referred were only conditional. Besides, there were two classes of views on the subject, some persons being desirous that the Commission should be abolished, while others wished to see its powers enlarged. He had thought it better, in these circumstances, to postpone legislation with regard to it till next year; but he hoped early in the Session to bring in a Bill dealing with it.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[Lords.]—[Bill 275.]

(Mr. J. Lowther.)

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Mr. J. LOWTHER, in moving that the Bill, as amended, be now considered, said, he desired to inform the House of the names of the Commissioners selected under the Bill. Giving them in alphabetical order, they were—The Right Hon. John Thomas Ball, the Earl of Belmore, Professor Molloy, the O'Conor Don, the Right Hon. Christopher Palles, Professor Porter, and Professor Salmon. These names required no introduction, still less any explanation from him. Hon. Members, however, might be struck with the omission of one name, which he believed all of them would have desired to have seen in the list—he meant that of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). He regretted to have to inform the House that the hon. and learned Gentleman, although most desirous, as he always had been, to give all the assistance in his power to the promotion of the cause of education in Ireland, felt himself precluded by his multifarious engagements, and also, unfortunately, by the state of his health, from undertaking the duties of a Commissioner.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration."—(Mr. J. Lowther.)

MR. CHARLES LEWIS, who had a Notice on the Paper for the consideration of the Amendments that day three months, said, that the Bill had been promised to Parliament in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech at the commencement of the Session, and now they were asked to discuss some of the main provisions of the measure on the 12th of August, when a large number of Members had deserted their duty, when there was only an attenuated House, and when, if it were not for the serried ranks of Irish Members opposite, who had so loyally obeyed the call of their distinguished Leader, there would hardly be a quorum. Not only the House, but the people of Ireland, it seemed to him, had not been properly treated by the Government in this matter. Unfortunately, the form of government of the Episcopal Church of Ireland was such that neither by Courts, Synod, or meetings, had there been an opportunity of testing the opinion of that religious Body since the introduction of the Bill. Upon the second reading, the hon. Member for Dungannon (Mr. T. A. Dickson), speaking on behalf of one section of Presbyterians, said their support of the measure was all but unanimous, and challenged the right of himself (Mr. Lewis) to speak as a representative of that Body. The hon. Member was mistaken in supposing he had made any such claim. At that time, public opinion was doubtful and quiescent; but since the Bill had passed Committee a portion of the Protestant community of Ireland had not been slow to express their opinion upon the character of the Bill. On Thursday week last the Presbytery of Belfast, which represented 60 congregations, had, with but one dissentient, passed a vote of condemnation of the Bill. The Ballymena Presbytery, also a great centre of Presbyterianism in the county of Antrim, unanimously condemned it; as did also that of Glandermot, near Londonderry. But more than that, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, presided over by Dr. Porter, one of the most accomplished, experienced, and judicious scholars to be found in any of the Churches of Ireland, came unanimously to a resolution adverse to the Bill. That was the product of the last few days; and if another month could elapse, the measure would have received the almost unanimous condemnation of the whole Presbyterian Body, which comprised nearly half of the Protestant communions of Ireland. This was the result of the extraordinary course which the Government had pursued, keeping back the Bill until the House of Commons was attenuated and in the power of the Government, aided by their new allies and united Home Rule Party. He hoped the results of the alliance would not be so disastrous as some had anticipated; but when they saw the Government and the Home Rulers shaking hands over the dead body of the mixed system of education in Ireland he could not congratulate the House or the country upon it. The Government in Committee refused to admit anything like a real Conscience Clause, wishing Clause 7 to be read in that sense, although it was altogether different to that in the English and Scotch Elementary Education Acts. This Bill dealt with public money; because, by the Irish Church Disendowment Act, these funds were withdrawn from private use, and from both the old corporation and the new corporation of the Church of Ireland. The Disendowment Act, however, expressly stated the purposes to which those funds should be applied; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), in his speech proposing that Act, distinctly refused to allow them to be applied to educational purposes, as in that case they would be likely to lead to sectarian bitterness and party strife. The opponents of the Bill had been beaten on the point of the Conscience Clause and of inspection. His third objection to the measure was that it was a direct step towards concurrent endowment, and therefore was a reversal of the principle of legislation that had been acted upon for the last quarter of a century. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had suggested that the sting would be taken out of the Bill if the results fees were dispensed with, and the whole of the money spent in Exhibition Prizes. How did the Government treat that suggestion? Not a word was said upon it by the Government, and they treated it with scorn and indignation. The fact was that this Bill was nothing less than the precursor of a University Bill drawn upon the same lines which had been promised to a certain section of that House, and to be introduced either next year or the year after; and as it was his intention to test the opinion of the House on several of the leading Amendments, he would not waste 10 minutes by asking the House to divide at this stage. With reference to those Amendments, he would read an extract from a letter of the 5th of August, and dated from this august Assembly, from the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), which had called back the Irish Members from their Recess in such numbers. The letter said—

> "You will perceive by the Notice Paper that the opponents of the Bill will endeavour to secure its rejection; but, failing that, to carry certain sectarian Amendments—[Mr. Butt: Hear, hear!]—which will entirely change the character of the measure."

He would relieve the hon. and learned Member from any apprehension on the first point, by stating that at present he should not divide the House against the Bill; but should it pass the present stage without amendment, he should feel it his duty to give hon. Members an opportunity of voting against the Bill by moving its rejection on the third reading. He denied that the Amendment of which he had given Notice was of a sectarian character. It was a mere copy, mutatis mutandis, of the Conscience Clause, in the English Elementary Act of 1870.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Amendments are not before the House. The hon. Member must confine himself to the Question.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS said, he had no intention of discussing the Amendments. He only wished to say their object was to keep an open door for every one of these schools; to protect the pupils from proselytism when there; and to make sure they would have all the advantages from the expenditure of those public funds to which all classes were alike entitled. The Government had now, at the last moment, under the great pressure which had been put upon them, given the House the names of the Commissioners. He only knew the gentlemen named in a very general and public way; and, on the whole, he thought they might be taken as a fair representation of public opinion, with the exception that whereas there were three Roman Catholics and three Episcopalians on the Commission there was but one Presbyterian, although the Presbyterian Body comprised half the Protestant population. But although he might disagree from the leading principles of the Bill, he was satisfied that Her Majesty's Government had introduced it with the most bonâ fide intention to improve intermediate education in Ireland. In his opinion, it was a mistake not to require each State-aided school in Ireland to receive day boarders, who should be admitted at certain times when there would be no fear of proselytism by either religious teaching, services, or symbols. He objected to the measure, however, not so much in itself, but because of what it led to; and the Roman Catholics themselves looked upon it as the beginning of a system of direct endowment of denominational education. A Belfast paper, which had been sent anonymously to him, stated—

> "It is, no doubt, a fact that the Roman Catholics will reap large advantages from the Bill; but their anxiety is more as to what it promises than as to what it gives—the richer gifts of which it is the herald—for this Bill does not cover the whole ground. It is the mere fringe; but before the larger questions come to be settled, the people will be educated."

Yes; educated by a Tory Government—by the successors of the late Lord Derby, who introduced the mixed system. Would the Government throw away this splendid heritage, which was connected with no particular Party, and deliberately break down the hedge which surrounded it? The Government now had an opportunity of repudiating any such policy, and he hoped they would avail themselves of it. He was led to understand that this Bill was likely to be the precursor of a University Bill. It did a good thing in a bad way. That being so, the duty rested with those who thought there was something to be preserved in the education of Ireland to resist the measure. Members had been taken by surprise at the end of the Session, in being asked to reverse the policy sanctioned by Parliament for many years. For himself, whatever might be the result, he would never regret having lifted up his humble voice in striving to induce the House to amend the Bill in a most important direction. Even though he should vote alone, he would give his vote against what he considered was the beginning of a downward and perilous course.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, that the hon. Member for Dungannon (Mr. T. A. Dickson), who was unavoidably absent, had written to him to explain that what he stated on the second reading was that it was a most remarkable—he would not say a suspicious—fact, but a fact eminently worthy of the attention of the House, that of all the Irish Presbyterian Gentlemen sitting in that House, not one could be procured to get up and attack this measure except the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry, who was not himself an Irish Presbyterian.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Charles Lewis) had again referred to the fact that he, having on the second reading of the Bill trespassed on the indulgence of the House for some considerable time, did not feel himself justified in making another speech when the discussion did not extend to a late period of the evening. On a subsequent occasion, he explained that no disrespect or discourtesy was intended either to him or to any other Member of the House by the course he had adopted. His hon. Friend had, however, now repeated the allegation that he was wanting in respect to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). Indeed, his hon. Friend said he had treated the observations of the right hon. Gentleman with scorn and indignation. Now, he entirely demurred to the application of those terms. In point of fact, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was a warm eulogy of almost every line of the Bill. It was an expression, exchoed by those who sat around him, of gratitude to the Government for having dealt with this question. In these circumstances, he felt he should not be justified in detaining the House by making a reply to a speech with almost every sentence of which he himself agreed.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY spoke in high terms of the appointment of the Members of the Board, stating that they were gentlemen of general ability, who possessed the confidence of the country, and who had had large experience in dealing with public questions. This matter of public confidence in the Commissioners was, he considered, of far greater importance than many hon. Members supposed; and he believed that they enjoyed the thorough confidence of the people of Ireland. It ought to be remembered that former educational schemes had failed in Ireland, because they were not brought in in a proper manner. In regard to the present scheme, he thought that the Government had acted wisely in most of what they had done. He quite joined in the regret of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) as to the absence of a Presbyterian Member on the Board. He suggested, with great deference, that there ought to be two paid Commissioners appointed—one of whom should be a Catholic, and another should be a member of one of the Protestant forms of religion—and he thought it was due to the Presbyterians that one of their number should be appointed. The great opposition to this Bill had come from a certain section of the Presbyterians in the North; but he, speaking there as a Catholic, begged to say that the spirit of liberality and fairness in which its provisions would be exercised would show that the suspicions entertained of his Catholic fellow-countrymen were unfounded.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, the House was greatly indebted to the hon. Member for Londonderry for having again pointed out the direction in which this Bill went. He (Mr. Newdegate) did not desire to withhold a single shilling of the proposed grant from the encouragement of intermediate education in Ireland; but this was a case in which it was possible to season a gift with what might be fairly described as an element of poison. The hon. Member for Londonderry spoke of the Amendments he had attempted to make in the Bill in Committee; but he had said nothing of the Amendment which was moved by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr.

Courtney)—an Amendment which he (Mr. Newdegate) intended to submit to the House in the present stage of the Bill. That Amendment was directed against the latter part of the Bill, without interfering with the first and the main principle of the Bill—the proposed foundation of scholarships and rewards for the acquisition of knowledge by the middle classes of Ireland. With that, the Amendment he intended to propose would not interfere; but it struck at the second part of the Bill, which proposed the payment by results to the managers of schools in which successful candidates for prizes were educated. Let the House observe the principle which was involved in this proposal. Fifty, at least, of the schools which it was proposed by this Bill to endow were known to be Conventual or Monastic Institutions, and the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), when alluding to this subject in 1874, said that he did not urge this proposal of payment to the managers of these schools, because that must inevitably raise the question of concurrent endowment. The Lord Chancellor, in proposing this Bill "elsewhere," said that it was directly connected with future measures for what he called "University Reform in Ireland." Therefore, if the principle of concurrent endowment was allowed to remain in this Bill, that was obviously the principle which it was intended to transfer to University Education in Ireland. This they had on the authority of the author of the Bill himself. Now, he had given Notice of an Amendment, upon which he should presently ask the opinion of the House, and he desired to repeat that his object was that the principle of the Maynooth Grant should not be renewed; but that the principle upon which the Queen's Colleges in Ireland were founded should be adhered to and extended by the operation of this Bill. He remembered the establishment of the Maynooth Grant in 1845. He remembered, also, the establishment of the Queen's Colleges. For nearly 30 years the Maynooth Grant continued to be a bone of contention and a source of discord. The principle upon which the Queen's Colleges were founded was completely different, was thoroughly consistent with the principle of the Irish national system of primary education; though the Queen's Colleges had not been so successful as they might have been, but for the bitter opposition of the successor of the lamented Archbishop Murray, the enlightened Roman Catholic Archbishop, who consented to the principle of the Queen's Colleges. Had it not been for the bitter opposition of Cardinal Cullen, those Colleges would have been more successful than they had been; still, they had been successful. But the principle introduced in the latter part of this Bill was a different principle. It was the principle of the Maynooth Grant; it was fraught with all the disturbing influences which had been incident to the existence of that Grant; until at last, for the sake of peace, Parliament commuted it under the Act for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Protestant Church in Ireland; commuted it under a promise that the principle of it should no more be renewed than the principle of the establishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. He looked upon this portion of the Bill with the deepest suspicion, and for this reason—that it was the sequence to a system of agitation in this House—a system of agitation which Parliament had had reason to lament; a system of obstruction in this House which had taken the place of external agitation, and had proved highly detrimental to the character of the House. With the permission of the House, he would state a little more fully why he objected to the proposed renewal of the principle of the Maynooth Grant, as contained in this Bill, remembering that, out of the House, and especially in Ireland, it would be represented that this concession was the fruit of agitation, the fruit of obstruction. How did Mr. O'Connell receive the intelligence, in 1845, that the Maynooth Grant was to be enlarged and made permanent by Sir Robert Peel? He (Mr. Newdegate) had quoted the passage which he was about to read before in that House; but he would now quote it again. Mr. O'Connell received a copy of the Maynooth Bill in Conciliation Hall, where he had organized the Repeal agitation, and these were the terms in which he expressed his gratitude—

> "I would not, I confess, go to this length when I came into this room to-day; for I had a little inkling that there was some trick under all this liberality; but my friend, Dr. Gray, brought me the Act of Parliament, and I read it in my seat here, and I proclaim it excellent in all its parts. [Cheers.] But is this to make us give up agitation? [Cries of 'No; we will die first,' and cheers.] I do not mean to quarrel with anyone who differs in opinion from me on any subject; still less am I inclined to quarrel with anyone who thinks with me that it was the Repeal agitation that produced this change in Sir Robert Peel with reference to Maynooth. [Cheers.] Agitation, I thank you. [Cheers.] Conciliation Hall, I am obliged to you. [Cheers.] Repeal Association, Maynooth ought to pray for you. [Loud cheering.] There is a story told of the officers of the Irish Brigade. As long as a young man who came into the French Army, as a cadet, conducted himself well, he was left a cadet; so they always found it necessary to become a little riotous to get promoted to the rank of officer. [Laughter.]"

[Cheers from the Irish Benches.] Yes, he (Mr. Newdegate) perfectly understood that cheer. Mr. O'Connell continued—

> "We, in Conciliation Hall, represent the officer. The Irish cadets understand the policy of misconducting themselves. This is a boon to us to misbehave in future, and we are too honest not to give them the price for their money. [Cheers and Laughter.] When they tell us that we should thank Sir Robert Peel, and the 200 myrmidons that go with him from one side of the House to the other, I say, Thank Conciliation Hall! Thank Agitation! [Cheers.]"

The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House the other day that he had viewed obstruction in the House more leniently than most men; and he (Mr. Newdegate) defied the right hon. Gentleman to escape from the inference which would be drawn in Ireland, that this renewal of the principle of the Maynooth Grant—this connection of the administration of public money with the internal system and discipline of Monastic and Conventual Institutions—had been made in the same sense as Mr. O'Connell understood the gift of the Grant to Maynooth. He remembered that the speech of Mr. O'Connell and the passing of the Maynooth Bill were followed by two years of such outrage in Ireland, such an amount of murder, and such a disgraceful condition that, although he (Mr. Newdegate) voted against a Coercion Bill when it was first proposed by Sir Robert Peel, he was compelled to vote for a similar Bill in 1847. Now this, he contended, was the amari aliquid in the Bill before the House. He would willingly promote intermediate education in Ireland; but if the Government were about to renew the principle of the Maynooth Grant, the connection of their officers with the methods of teaching and discipline of these Roman Catholic institutions, there was some reason for the Earl of Beaconsfield appealing to the Conservative deputations who lately waited upon him to suppress what he indicated as eccentricities, and to apply themselves to the organization of opinion, and so manifest their devotion to him personally, that he might be able to do anything and go anywhere. They might now have a shrewd suspicion of the sense of which this advice was given, and of the direction in which the Earl of Beaconsfield was going. He trusted, however, that when the House proceeded with the further consideration of the Bill, Her Majesty's Government would yet be disposed to free the measure then under consideration from the principle of the Maynooth Grant, which was directly involved in that part of the Bill which came under the deceptive term of "payment by results." He hoped the Government might be disposed to concede the Amendment, which he, as a humble, but consistently Conservative, Member of that House, intended to propose; but if they did not, they might rely upon it that they had not heard the last of that which, sooner or later, they would find to be a fatal gift.

SIR JOHN LESLIE considered that the names of the Commissioners would give general satisfaction to the people of Ireland. He did not share in those exaggerated fears which were expressed by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) or the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), in regard to this question of intermediate education, but looked upon the system as one of progress and enlightenment. He looked forward with hope to see the measure carried out in the spirit in which it was conceived, and that it should not be allowed to drift in the same direction as the National School Board had allowed the national system to drift, which was away from its fundamental rules, and, as he thought in that instance, to the great disadvantage of education in some parts of the country.

MR. COURTNEY, in reply to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, pointed out that the most striking part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had been directed to the payment of result fees. The Chief Secretary had stated that the speech did not touch the vital principle of the Bill. He therefore hoped, when the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) came to be discussed, the Chief Secretary for Ireland would be prepared to strike out the section of the Bill authorizing the payment of such fees.

Mr. MACARTNEY said, he should be delighted to see intermediate education introduced into Ireland to all classes and to all religions; but it seemed to him that if the Bill was intended for the benefit of those who could not send their children a long distance to be educated, the object sought would not be gained. He considered the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) rather extraordinary—that one of the two paid Commissioners should be a Roman Catholic and the other a Presbyterian, thus excluding every member of the disestablished Church from any share in the administration of the funds which were originally the property of the Church to which he himself belonged. He was afraid that the system of payment by results would have this effect—that the teachers would direct all their attention to the clever boys, to the neglect of the great body of the pupils.

Lord CHARLES BERESFORD congratulated the Government upon having introduced a Bill which seemed to satisfy almost everybody. He hoped they would follow it up by a measure providing for denominational education and the endow ment of a Catholic University.

Motion agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered.

New Clause (Reports and accounts), —(Mr. James Lowther,)—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS moved the following clause:—

(Regulations for conduct of schools.)

"The Board shall not make any payment to the managers of any school, unless it shall be satisfied of the compliance of the managers of such school with the following conditions:—

"(1.) It shall not be required, as a condition, of any child being addmitted into or continuing in the school that he shall attend or abstain from attending any place of religious worship, or that he shall attend any religious observance or any instruction in religious subjects in the school or elsewhere from which observance or instruction he may be withdrawn by the parent, or that he shall, if withdrawn by his parent, attend the school on any day exclusively set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs;

"(2.) The time or times during which any religious observance is practised, or instruction in religious subjects is given at any meeting of the school, shall be either at the beginning or at the end, or at the beginning and the end of such meeting, and shall be inserted in a time table to be approved by the Board, and to be kept permanently and conspicuously affixed in every schoolroom, and any scholar may be withdrawn by his parent from such observances or instruction without forfeiting any of the other benefits of the school."

The hon. Member said, he should think it his duty to take the opinion of the House on the clause. It was taken almost verbatim from the Elementary Education Act, and, therefore, came with an imprimatur which, at all events, would be satisfactory. What had the Legislature done to give effect to the Conscience Clause in England and Scotland? The Conscience Clause — or, rather, the Conscience Regulation—in Ireland did not exist upon legislation, but upon the rules and regulations made by the National Board. The regulations under the management of the Board system in Ireland as regarded elementary education were so generally analogous to those in operation in England and Scotland, that one might venture to regard them all as under one heading. They required that the time set apart for religious worship and religious observance should be either at the commencement or at the end, or partly at the commencement and partly at the end, and that the rest of the day should be solely devoted to secular education. The first part of the clause said that no payment should be made to the managers of any school unless the Board should be satisfied that no pupil at the school should be permitted to remain in attendance at any religious instruction which the parents would not sanction. If it was intended to set apart a certain portion of the day, what was the difficulty in saying so in so many words? It was intended to give the parent apparent protection without any real protection being afforded. For all that appeared in that clause, there might not be a single school in Ireland receiving benefits under this Act which was not purely of a denominational character; whereas the policy of the Legislature under the English and Scotch Act, and the Irish national system, had been to keep open every school endowed with public money, so that it might be available by members of every religious denomination. He would assume that the Government wished to keep up the principle upon which the Legislature had uniformly acted—that where public money was voted for school purposes, it should be open to the whole community; but this clause did not attempt anything of that kind, and in its present shambling form, it seemed as if it had been framed for the express purpose of not meeting the case. At a deputation to the Lord Chancellor, the statement was made that the clause had been framed on the precedents of the endowed schools; but these precedents dealt with private endowments, and the State had no right to interfere with them. The Irish Church Act of 1869 required that the Church surplus should be, in the main, appropriated for the relief of persons suffering from unavoidable calamity or misfortune. That directly pointed to the relief of lunatics, or persons suffering from intense poverty and distress. If it had been applied in that manner, it would have relieved the rates; and, therefore, in taking that money and appropriating it for that purpose, they were only trifling, shifting it from one portion of the national pocket to the other; but the Irish Church was treated as a corporation of a private character, which ought to be disendowed. Therefore, it seemed to him that they were dealing with it much in the same way as if they were voting so much of the grant to Maynooth for the purposes of public education. He asked the House, accordingly, to pass a real Conscience Clause, not one which was a mere name and a shadow. There was no provision in the Bill requiring any school to be kept open or to receive a single day scholar.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD, in seconding the Motion, said, that while it had always been part of his political creed that there should be no distinction between Catholics and Protestants, he was not prepared to say that Catholics should have advantages which Protestants did not enjoy in any part of the United Kingdom. The clause was found to answer in England and Scotland, and he could not conceive any reason why it should not be applied to Ireland. The clause in the Bill was not a Conscience Clause at all. It was a mere sham. It was competent, as the Bill now stood, to shut a school in the face of any pupil whose parents objected to the religious observances in the school, and so to exclude him altogether.

New Clause—(Mr. Charles Lewis,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. J. P. CORRY said, that knowing the feeling which existed amongst the Presbyterians in the North of Ireland, he felt bound to support the Amendment. No doubt, the Bill was introduced to improve intermediate education; but he thought that no child should be shut out of the benefit of the grants made under the Bill. That could not be secured unless the Conscience Clause was made stringent; and he should therefore support his hon. Friend if he went to a division, which he hoped he would do.

MR. GREGORY opposed the clause. The names of the Commissioners had been received with universal approval, and he thought they might be trusted to carry out the Act. He did not believe the Bill contained the principle on which the Maynooth Grant was made. It was a Bill for the promotion of intermediate education in Ireland, and as such must necessarily deal with boarding schools as well as day schools. The proposed new clause said that no school could enter into the competitions provided under the Bill if the children receiving instruction in such school were compelled to attend any place of religious worship. He ventured to think there was hardly any boarding school in this country, and he presumed it was the same in Ireland, where the children were not compelled to attend some place of religious worship, generally such as their parents chose; and, therefore, if the clause was adopted, it would have the effect of shutting out from the competitions any child brought up in a school where religious worship was required.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) had more than once informed the House they were dealing with public money. Just as the county rates in Galway were public money, the Church funds were public money; but in the sense that it was Imperial money the Church surplus was not public money. It was Irish money, raised in Ireland; and he thought, therefore, that it should be exclusively devoted to Irish objects, and that in its disposal deference should be made to the wishes of the Irish people. Now, he might remind the House that when the Bill was in Committee an Amendment to the effect proposed by the hon. Member was rejected by 50 Irish Members to 3. He believed that the Conscience Clause as it stood in the Bill would be quite sufficient for the protection of children; and that the only result of adopting the clause suggested by the hon. Member would be to harass Catholic schools. There was a large Protestant population in Londonderry and Belfast; but there was a much smaller one in the three towns of Galway, Tuam, and Ballinasloe. In each of these towns there was a Protestant school, and the Protestants would not be forced to send their children to Catholic schools. In such circumstances, the new clause could have no useful object. It was said that Presbyterians were anxious for mixed education; but it was not shown that they were placed at any disadvantage by the Conscience Clause already provided. It was all very well for Presbyterians to have less objection than others to mixed education; but that was no reason why they should force it on others. He believed that the Roman Catholics would hardly get their fair share of the grants to be made under the Bill, if that share were tested by numbers. With a few exceptions, hon. Gentlemen did not object to the Roman Catholics deriving this assistance; and he hoped the House would reject an Amendment which would be fatal to the efficiency of the Bill.

Mr. MACARTNEY repudiated the idea that those who approved of the Amendment desired to harass Catholic schools. It was an utterly unfounded accusation. Nothing could be further from his own thoughts than any such intention. The imputation came with a bad grace from those who advocated equal laws for England and Ireland, seeing that the clause was already in operation in England. To say that the same principle should not be applied to Ireland was to deny that the property derived from the disestablishment of the Irish Church was not public property, which it was asserted to be at the time the Act was carried. When it was said that it was peculiarly Irish property because it was paid by Irish land, it must be remembered that the majority of those who paid it would not derive any benefit from the Bill, for they did not belong to the Roman Catholic or the Presbyterian Churches.

Sir. WILLIAM HARCOURT fully admitted that the surplus of the disestablished Irish Church was public property, and also that, as it was derived from Irish sources, it should be applied to Irish purposes; and the only question was, how was it to be applied? No doubt there had been in this country a strong feeling in favour of an undenominational system of elementary education; but Parliament established what was substantially a denominational system, and that fact materially altered his views as to what ought to be done in regard to Ireland. He could be no party to pressing upon the people of the latter country a system which had not been insisted upon for England. The argument that the present proposal was one for placing Ireland in the same position as England, would be tenable if it were not that the English Conscience Clause was enforced only in elementary schools. It was obvious that intermediate schools must be dealt with in a different manner; and the Government had taken as their model the clause in the English Endowed Schools Act, which was stronger than this clause, for it required that the education to be given should have the sanction of parents. It was of no use imposing conditions that would not be accepted by managers of schools, and they must deal with the facts as they found them existing in Ireland. He should support the clause as it stood in the Bill.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that although denominational education, both in primary schools and at Universities, was assisted in England, the State had required, as a condition of that assistance, that the Conscience Clause and open inspection should be carried out. He admitted, however, with shame and regret, that at the great intermediate public schools of the country attendance at the religious instruction of the Church of England was still required; but those who had conscientiously opposed that restriction upon education in England were perfectly free to claim for Ireland the liberty which they had not been able to obtain for England. He could not understand why the managers of a school receiving public money should refuse to receive a boy professing the religion of the minority. If the parent did not object to send the boy, he did not see why the managers should object. The extreme jealousy which appeared to be felt with regard to this Proviso on the part of managers did show that there would be intruders if there was liberty for parents to send their children. It was not a matter of creed, but of the majority and minority, and they were bound to protect the rights of minorities. He warmly supported the clause of the hon. Member for Londonderry, which he hoped would be pressed to a division.

MR. BUTT said, if there were a number of Protestants who were anxious—enthusiastic, even—to place their children under the guidance of Roman Catholic teachers, he could understand the clause which had been moved; but it was no such thing. This clause was not a Conscience Clause. A Conscience Clause, according to the meaning he had always understood was attached to it, was a clause introduced for the protection of the child. He said that that subject was fully provided for by the clause which the Bill contained at present; and it would be impossible, he thought, to frame a clause which would more effectually gain that object than the one now contained in the Bill. The clause in the Bill said that a child should not be excluded from the benefits of a secular education, even if that child was prevented from joining in the religious instruction. He asked whether that did not do everything for the child that could be done? He knew it had been objected that there were very few places where there would be children of different persuasions in the same school. He must say that he thought the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Charles Lewis) made a number of regulations vexatiously interfering with the ordinary rules of schools, and doing so in schools in which there was not the remotest chance of children of different religions being educated together. He must, in justice, say that the hon. Member had greatly changed if he wished to vex or harass any human being; but what he wished to point out was that the effect of this new clause would be both harassing and annoying. The Bill was not a measure for the purpose of establishing a great system of undenominational or intermediate education in Ireland. No Government would attempt to do that; but it was a very modest attempt to aid existing institutions—to take the institutions they found there, and to aid them. And how did the Bill propose to aid them? It would aid them by payment by results, and the true test would be, could they encourage education efficiently? The effect of the Amendment would be to exclude at once a large number of schools, because they knew that every Roman Catholic manager would not agree to the test that was proposed in it. He asked the House to say if that was the way in which they would remedy the injustice? There were already Protestant endowments for Protestant education in Ireland. One of the grievances of which Catholics complained was that they had none, and now, when a very poor and small aid was proposed to be given to schools not founded by this House, hon. Gentlemen would pass a rule which would admit Presbyterian and exclude Catholic schools. The great merit of the Bill was that it avoided altogether entering into religious dissensions, and took part with neither denominational or undenominational. It came forward upon that principle, and it said to the managers—"Educate the boy, and you will be paid exactly in proportion as you do so." What should be the wish of every Protestant? Why, it should be to bring education into those schools in which they would tell him there was now only darkness.

"Didicisse fideliter artes,
Emollit mores nec sinit esse feros."

Instead, however, of that, by pushing this Amendment, they would, by way of meeting the ignorance which it was said existed in Roman Catholic schools, give them no encouragement whatever. Such a view as that was most bigoted.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS rose to Order. He never made the slightest imputation of ignorance or bigotry whatever.

MR. BUTT said, he really was not thinking of the hon. Gentleman at the time.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS said, if the hon. and learned Gentleman had not named him, he certainly looked at him.

Mr. BUTT could assure the hon. Gentleman that he did so unconsciously, and if the hon. Member's form reached his eye, it certainly did not reach his mind. He was not thinking of the hon. Gentleman at all.

Mr. MACARTNEY said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had his eye on him (Mr. Macartney) while he used the words referred to.

Mr. BUTT assured hon. Gentlemen that he had not meant any hon. Member in particular; but he had not the slightest hesitation in saying that this Amendment was framed upon a false and bigoted view of the teaching of Roman Catholics in Ireland. ["Order!"] He was at perfect liberty to say that. He believed there was no subject which was spoken upon with so much inaccuracy as the subject of mixed education in Ireland. There was no such thing as mixed education in Ireland. The Presbyterians would not have it. He must say he wished the hon. Gentleman could induce the Presbyterians to admit the Roman Catholics to their schools. How was it, then, that the Presbyterians condemned the Bill? He had seen the papers, and they said the Presbyterians would not be satisfied with any system of education that did not provide united secular and separate religious instruction. Now, he had the greatest respect for the Presbyterians; and if it was a matter relating to their own Church, he would attach far more weight to their opinion on this matter than he did. But if they wished united education in secular matters and separate education in religion, they could have it, for they could establish separate schools for religious education. He must say that, so far as he could see, the Bill did not interfere in any way with any Presbyterian obtaining the benefits of this Bill. He did not attach the same weight to these representations coming from a body which he so highly respected as he should if they had come in a legitimate capacity. The question, after all, was this. This Bill gave certain advantages. Would the House say now—"We will withdraw those advantages from the Roman Catholic schools?" That was the real question, because this Amendment imposed conditions that they knew a great many Roman Catholic managers would not accept. [An hon. Member: And Protestants, too.] Yes; and Protestant managers, too. He asked whether there was a Protestant parent in that House who, if anxious for his son's education, would send him to a Roman Catholic boarding-school, where the Roman Catholic religion was to be taught, under the control of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics? Did they did not see every day in the Courts of Chancery cases arise in which there was a dispute as to what religion children were to be brought up in? And the Lord Chancellor, when he decided, said, let the child be kept at a Roman Catholic school or at a Protestant school, as the case might be. That showed that the law recognized a distinction. This Bill was, perhaps, not entirely approved of by all parties; but he considered that it was a fair compromise between the contending parties. He therefore hoped the House would not spoil the measure, and would not permit any doctrinaires to hack it; but would take the course of ignoring all religious discussions, which could not be gone into without defeating the object of the Bill, and take the educational institutions as they had grown up amongst the people of Ireland, aid all those institutions fairly, and ignore altogether those quarrels with which the House had nothing to do.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, that on the second reading of the Bill, the clause under discussion was completely ignored, with the exception that some suggestions respecting it had emanated from a quarter entitled to great respect. It had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich that the 7th clause should be altogether omitted, and his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) seemed to think that the right hon. Gentleman's observations had not been sufficiently attended to. His (Mr. Lowther's) answer on a former occasion was that he thought a clause of this kind was required. The clause of his hon. Friend differed from that of the Government. He (Mr. Lowther) was not quite an impartial judge of their relative merits; but he preferred the clause in the Bill. His hon. Friend's clause, however suitable for elementary and day schools, was wholly inapplicable to a system of boarding-schools. In the clause of the Bill, as it stood, precautions had been taken that no pupil should be present during religious instruction which his parents and guardians had not actually sanctioned. That would throw the onus on the right quarter. His hon. Friend said there was nothing in the clause to prevent managers from excluding pupils. But what object would they have in doing so? If Roman Catholic managers were so anxious to proselytize as some hon. Gentlemen seemed to apprehend, surely they would admit with welcome as many as they could of a different religion from their own? Besides, on the principle of the more the merrier, the managers would wish to have as many boys as possible in order to earn more by result fees. Every inducement, indeed, was offered to them to give a good secular education to all comers. The utmost precautions were taken that inspections should be held at the discretion of the Board, and every facility was offered in the Bill for the Boards acquainting themselves by personal inspection with the manner in which the measure would be carried out. He hoped the discussion which had taken place would not be any further prolonged, and that it had convinced the House that it would not be advisable to accept the hon. Member's Amendment, and that it was in every respect less preferable than the clause of the Government as it stood in the Bill.

MR. J. COWEN said, he was, and always had been, an advocate of secular education. He held that the State had nothing to do with teaching religion, and that all schools—whether primary or secondary, supported either in a large or limited measure by the State—should confine themselves to secular instruction. Imparting the belief of any religious Body in national institutions was, in his judgment, unwise and unfair. But while that was his abstract opinion, he could not disguise from himself the fact, which he was sure was shared by many hon. Gentlemen, that in this case another course had been adopted, and that an attempt was deliberately made to treat Ireland in educational matters with considerable injustice. They had instituted a denominational system of education in England, where the predominating religion was Episcopalian or orthodox Dissent. They had adopted a like system in Scotland, where the belief was Presbyterianism. But in Ireland, where the inhabitants were mainly Catholics, they had adopted a system of secular education. He could not divest himself of the opinion that the difference that was thus instituted between the treatment of Irishmen and the treatment of Scotchmen and Englishmen arose from the fact that the Irish were Catholics and the English Protestants. The reason why Ireland was not dealt with like the other portions of the Empire was an unworthy and unmanly fear of the Papal faith or its upholders. If the Roman Catholic priests were as dangerous to the State as some hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Benches would have them to believe, the very best way, in his judgment, to deprive them of that authority over the people was to treat them with absolute impartiality and complete justice. As long as ever they laboured under the belief that they were dealt with unfairly, they would always have the sympathies of their countrymen with them. If they wished to weaken the influence of the priesthood over the Irish peasantry, they could not do better than grant the Roman Catholic Church every concession that in right it could demand, and which they had now given to their Protestant brethren. On these grounds, therefore—although he saw the force of a good many of the arguments of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis)—he would support the Bill as it stood. He did not approve of Conscience Clauses under all circumstances. It was an undignified thing to ask a parent to define the faith of his children. He would rather that no such restrictions existed; but if they were to be enforced, the one embodied in the Bill was just as good, and, in his opinion, better, than the Amendment. They should always recollect the education, the traditions, and the circumstances of the country they were legislating for. They might not like the Irishmen to be Catholics, but they were Catholics. They had to deal with that fact; and being Catholics, they would refuse to avail themselves of the concession that was now proposed to be made to them, if it was clogged with the condition suggested by the hon. Member for Londonderry. To make a present to a man, and to load it with qualifications to which the recipient conscientiously objected, was to give him nothing at all. It was a species of mockery. The Catholics would accept the Bill as it stood; but they would not accept it if the clause now submitted was embodied in it. While, therefore, a strenuous advocate of a secular system for all parts of the United Kingdom, he could not do otherwise than vote against the Amendment; because, to support it, would really be to deprive the Bill of any value that it possessed. It was intended as a message of peace and goodwill to the Irish people, and as such he voted for it.

Mr. NEWDEGATE hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had convinced the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) that the denominational system, which the Bill was intended to establish in Ireland, was of a far more exclusive character than that which prevailed either in Scotland or England. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford had said that because they had not succeeded in establishing a purely secular system in England, therefore he should vote against the only means presented to the House by which a more stringently denominational system than the hon. and learned Member for Limerick advocated could be avoided in Ireland. Believing, as he did, that the clause proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) would effect that object he (Mr. Newdegate) should vote for it.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS, after the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), thought himself entitled to say a few words. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick had taken the liberty of saying that his (Mr. Charles Lewis's) Amendment was framed on a false and bigoted view of the action of Catholic teaching in Ireland. He had long been an admirer of the hon. and learned Gentleman; he had admired his character and his ability, and he had imbibed his principles. Many a time he had attended public meetings in the Freemasons' Hall, which the hon. and learned Gentleman addressed. He had admired the oratory of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and if he imbibed of the spirit of which the hon. and learned Gentleman now called bigoted, if he drank too deeply of the spring that had always been copious, though not always the same, it was hardly fair for the hon. and learned Gentleman to enter into the statements about the bigoted Amendments. He challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to refer to the speech he (Mr. Charles Lewis) made on the second reading of the Bill, and to say that his action throughout had not been consistent; whether he had not argued that it was unfair to set up one class of religionists against another, but that all should be placed on an equal footing? Therefore, when the hon. and learned Member said that he had formed a false and bigoted view of the Catholic system, it passed by him and affected him not, and if anyone was the cause of it, it was the hon. and learned Gentleman himself. What was complained of was that, whereas the National School system kept the school door open, under inspection, for every denomination, this Bill proceeded in a totally different line, there being not the slightest provision that the school should be open to all classes. It was said that the present system of education in Ireland was denominational. It was denominational in this sense—that if they had a village where there were no Catholics, the school would be Protestant, and vice versâ. According to the Report of the Commissioners in 1877, no less than 56·9 per centage of all the schools in Ireland had a mixed attendance of Catholic and Protestant pupils. In Ulster, where there was a mixed population, the percentage was so high as 76·3; in Catholic Munster there were no less than 800 or 900 schools, with only about three or four Protestant scholars in each school. He did not expect that there would be the slightest discussion made on this subject, but that the union between the Home Rulers and the front Bench would be carried out to the resistance of every Amendment, a union which he hoped would he looked upon with felicity. He should be compelled to take a division on the question of the Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 102: Majority 81.—(Div. List, No. 271.)

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS then moved a clause providing that—

"Every school whose managers may make claim to any payment under this Act, shall be open at all times to the inspection of Inspectors appointed by the Board, so, however, that it shall be no part of the duties of such Inspector to inquire into any instruction in religious subjects given at such school, or to examine any scholar therein in religious knowledge, or in any religious subject or book."

The clause was a counterpart of the Conscience Clause in the Education Act. He simply moved it as a protest, and should not divide upon it unless requested by hon. Members.

New Clause—(Mr. Charles Lewis,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, that the subject of inspection was fully discussed in Committee, and that inspection was sufficiently provided for by the Bill as it stood.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that on his side of the House, hon. Members were prepared to support this Inspection Clause, who could not consent to the proposed Conscience Clause.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS, though he had no hope of breaking the phalanx of the Government and the Home Rulers allied against him, felt it his duty to move the insertion of a new clause, as follows:—

(Day pupils.)

"No school from which day pupils are excluded shall be allowed to receive any payment under this Act."

The Amendment had for its object that in those cases where managers of a school thought proper to make a hard-and-fast rule to receive no day scholars, thereby closing their door against any but a particular denomination, then the school should not participate in the benefits of the Act. Of course, he would be told it would be impossible to do that, and that the people of Ireland would not receive such a proposal; but he hoped the House would be disposed to ask for something more than that broad and general denunciation, when he tried to carry out what he believed were the intentions of that legislation—that the greatest facilities should be given to the greatest number to participate in the benefits intended to be given under it.

New Clause—(Mr. Charles Lewis,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

Mr. Serjeant SHERLOCK could not see how all educational establishments could be put on the same footing as regarded day schools, and debarred from the benefits of the Act, if they found it impossible to take a day scholar. The Amendment would have no effect except to inconvenience the managers of schools in their arrangements. The best educational institutions in Ireland would either be excluded from the benefit of this measure, or they would be obliged to alter their entire management, and considerably lower the standard of their pupils.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) failed to see that such a clause would advance the cause of education. If the managers found it desirable to take a day scholar, no doubt, they would do so; but if the school was a boarding school only, in a country district, for the education of the sons of gentlemen, it would be unreasonable to refuse that school a participation in the benefits of the Act unless day scholars were admitted from the rural district, where the class might be entirely different. If it was desirable to prescribe to schools in towns that they should receive day scholars, then, under the Act, the Board would have power to enact some provision to meet the case, in which it would be undesirable to lay down a broad maxim of this kind.

Question put, and negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. J. Lowther, the following Amendments were made:—

In Clause 2, page 1, line 17, after "year," insert "if any casual vacancy occurs in the office of chairman or vice-chairman, the Board shall, at a special meeting to be held not sooner than one month after the occurrence of such vacancy, choose some member of the Board to fill such vacancy, and the chairman or vice-chairman so elected shall continue in office so long only as the person in whose place he is so elected would have been entitled to continue if such vacancy had not occurred;

Clause 3, page 1, line 27, after "appoint," insert "such examiners, for such terms as the Board shall fix, and;"

Clause 4, page 2, line 5, after "the," insert "examiners and."

Clause 5 (Functions of Board).

MR. CHARLES LEWIS (for Mr. NEWDEGATE) moved to omit Sub-section 3. This was the first Amendment which would be necessary in order to strike out the result fees, which constituted a part of the scheme of endowment provided by the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN seconded the Amendment. He looked at it entirely as a question as to what were the best means of disposing of the £30,000 a-year. He most sincerely thought that the plan of giving to the managers of the schools result fees, the amount of which might have been given to pupils in another form, was a wrong plan. It was unjust to the pupils, and would impede rather than promote education. If the funds so proposed to be distributed were devoted to prizes or exhibitions, then a larger number of pupils would be rewarded, who would by the section, as it stood, be excluded. He should on this matter cordially divide with the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, although he had felt bound to vote with the majority in the last division.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out from the word "students," to the word "students," in line 19, inclusive.—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the House had already distinctly expressed an opinion that encouragement should be given to teachers and managers, as well as pupils. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) had done enough to save his credit among the community, showing his views and it was to be hoped a division would not be necessary. If, however, one was to be taken, the House had better dispose of the Amendment as soon as possible. He should vote against it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had to thank the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) for proposing, during his temporary and accidental absence from the House, the Amendment, the Notice for which stood in his name. That Amendment, as he had already indicated to the House, was to this effect. The Bill contained two principles; one was the principle of the direct payment to scholars of prizes for successful examinations, which was the principle on which the Queen's Colleges were founded; the other principle was the principle of the former Maynooth Grants, now abandoned. The College of Maynooth was originally founded at a time when the Papacy appeared extremely liberal. The First Napoleon, as the exponent of the principles of the first French Revolution, had overturned the Papacy, and deprived the Pope of his temporal dominions. The education of France having been, for a long period previous to the first French Revolution, under the direction of the Jesuits and Ultramontanes, who had worked the Monarchy and the aristocracy of France into the form that they preferred, the result throughout that country became—that the tyranny of their Government became so oppressive that the nation rose, and, after perpetrating, he was sorry to say, very gross excesses, abrogated the ancien régime and destroyed a system of government they could no longer endure. This country, alarmed by the outrages which were committed, and the danger to life and property which that Revolution entailed, made common cause with other European Powers, against the subversive principles of the Revolution. The Pope, having been deprived of his temporal Sovereignty in Italy, as he is now, became, under the necessity of the case, to all appearances, exceedingly liberal. The Papacy professed, through its organs in this country, doctrines more liberal even than the doctrines of the old Gallican Church, and the Pope and his agents seemed to renounce the extreme opinions, which had now been re-adopted by the Papacy, and affirmed by the Papal Council of 1870. At that time, when the College of Maynooth was founded, there existed a deficiency of education in Ireland; and the Irish House of Commons voted money for the establishment of the College of Maynooth, not exclusively, however, for the education of Roman Catholic priests, but also for that of the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland. Time went on. This was done, the House would observe, by the Irish Parliament, and during the existence of that Parliament, he must admit that it kept Maynooth very much within the bounds of moderation. At the time of the Union, this House conceived that it had inherited, as a matter of honour, the duty of providing means, by annual Votes, for the sustentation of Maynooth. But there came a change over the spirit of the Papacy. When peace was restored, in 1814, the Pope, as a mark of his gratitude to the Protestant countries which had re-established him in possession of his temporal dominions in Italy, proceeded at once to re-establish the Order of Jesuits. Some of the Professors at Maynooth, especially Professor Kenny, being connected with the Jesuits, left Maynooth, and at Clongowes, not far from Maynooth, established a strictly Jesuit seminary.

MR. SPEAKER: The House, I must remind the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, is engaged in considering the 3rd sub-section of the 5th clause of the Bill, and I am at a loss to understand how the observations of the hon. Member apply to that subject.

MR. NEWDEGATE submitted that his observations would be found to have a direct application to the question at issue. It was clear, from the Report of the Commission on Primary Education appointed in 1868, that a great part of the payments by results under this Bill would be made to schools, possessed and conducted by the Monastic and Conventual Orders of the Church of Rome, and any hon. Member of the House who chose to read the Blue Books which contained the evidence and Report of that Commission would find that there had been great difficulty in accommodating grants for primary education to the requirements of those institutions. Those institutions were similar to the College of Maynooth, as it now existed, a distinctly denominational establishment, provided for, in great measure, by a sum which this House had voted in order to terminate its connection with that establishment.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK: I rise to Order, Sir. This is not the Question before the House. It seems to me that nobody but the hon. Member himself can see the application of his arguments to the matter at issue.

MR. SPEAKER: The House is now considering an Amendment to Sub-section 3 of the 5th clause; and I confess that, at present, I do not see the connection between the remarks of the hon. Gentleman and that Amendment. At the same time, I do not wish to interrupt him, if he thinks that he can establish the relevancy of his remarks to the Question before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would establish the relevancy of his remarks, if he might be permitted to do so. It was distinctly in evidence, and had been admitted in debate, that many of the Roman Catholic schools to whom it was now proposed to grant money as the result of the successful examination of their pupils, were exactly in the same position as the College of Maynooth, after the House had decided upon dissolving its connection with that institution. He held that all the reasons which had induced the House to sever its connection with Maynooth, to give up the attempt to inspect the educational discipline of Maynooth College, to separate itself entirely from the form of education conducted there, were involved in the Question before the House. There were Commissioners in the case of Maynooth; but it was found practically there was no power of inspection—the inspection was so futile that Parliament gave it up. He (Mr. Newdegate) saw, and he condemned in the Bill on the Table, this proposal to adopt that principle of connection with the system of education conducted in these Monastic and Conventual institutions — institutions which were analogous to the College of Maynooth. He supported the Amendment, therefore, because he considered that—["Oh, oh!"]—he knew that this was a sore subject with the Home Rule Members opposite, who would prefer that there should be no inspection, or seemed to rely upon its becoming futile. He (Mr. Newdegate) would, on the contrary, vote for the Amendment; because its effect would be that, instead of making those payments to the directors and managers of those Monastic and Conventual institutions, of which there were at least 50 in Ireland, which involved the necessity of a pretended inspection, the payments would be made upon the same principle as the payment of prizes was made in the Queen's Colleges—in other words, the payments would be made directly to the successful examinees or their parents. That principle had been found consistent with the national system of education in Ireland, and which Parliament had maintained, while it had abandoned its connection with Maynooth, where the other principle—the principle of State connection with the management of these Roman Catholic institutions—had been in force. The proposal before the House, made by the Government—and he lamented that they had made it—was to establish a connection with these exclusively Roman Catholic Monastic and Conventual institutions exactly upon the same principle as that by which the State had formerly been connected with Maynooth. The difference was that the payment to those institutions would only be made on the production of successful examiners, instead of by a yearly allowance. He was surprised that hon. Members from Ireland should appear to be so utterly ignorant of the investigations and Report of the Commission of 1868. He held in his hand the Report of that Commission, and it referred to this payment by results without any very strict and therefore efficient system of inspection. The Commissioners suggested the adoption of a modified Conscience Clause as the only way by which it was possible for them to make payments to the primary schools, conducted by those Monastic and Conventual institutions. This gave force to what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, as to the objections of the managers of these institutions to inspection; but if public money were to be granted to the managers of these institutions, some sort of inspection was inevitable. The Commissioners of 1868 admitted, in their Report, that in Conventual schools a Conscience Clause was a mere embarrassment to the managers, while it could not afford real security or protection to the pupils; yet hon. Members advocated a Conscience Clause, proposed by the Government, in a form which the evidence taken under the Commission of 1868 showed would be a mere embarrassment to those Monastic and Conventual institutions and their managers, and could scarcely be of any avail to the pupils. When a Conscience Clause, modelled on the principle of the Conscience Clause operating in England and Scotland, was proposed by the hon. Member for Londonderry, it was rejected; the decision of the House, pronounced by a large majority, was totally inconsistent with the evidence given before the Commission of 1868, so far as the contemplated effect upon these Conventual and Monastic schools. He thought, then, he had established some connection between the facts he had adduced, and the arguments he had drawn from them. Hon. Members opposite, who professed Liberalism in this matter, sought to reconcile themselves to avoiding their principles by a determination to ignore the nature, the characteristics, and the discipline of these schools connected with the Monastic and Conventual institutions, which they were about virtually to endow—in fact, they seemed to have determined upon ignoring the leading facts of the subject with which they were dealing. For himself, he went upon this broad principle—that this State of England was a Protestant State, and was bound to the great principle of toleration; and he held that it was more consistent with the principle of toleration, when they did not profess to teach religion, and debarred themselves from meddling with religious education, that they should be stern in their adherence to respect for parental right. The best way to secure parental right in this case was to pay the school prizes directly to the successful pupil or his parent; thus leaving unfettered and uninterrupted the power of the parent to regulate the relations of the pupil with the school in which he was educated. That was the most tolerant principle; and when the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) confessed that these schools, in many instances connected with Monastic and Conventual institutions, were of such a nature that they would not admit practical inspection, and that a Conscience Clause was to the managers of those schools a mere futile embarrassment; when the hon. and learned Member argued thus, he (Mr. Newdegate) asked the House to steer clear of all the difficulties manifestly inseparable from interference with the management of these schools, and to rest its confidence as to the method of education upon parental right, and not to connect itself, however indirectly, with the discipline and management of institutions which the law still declared to be illegal. That seemed to him the simple solution of the matter, and strictly in accordance with the first principle of the Bill. The first principle of the Bill was that the rewards or prizes should be given for successful examinations in such subjects as were comprised in what was termed "intermediate education." Then let the House adhere simply to that principle. It was absurd to suppose that the inspection of these Monastic and Conventual institutions would be a reality, when it was known that they would not submit to inspection, if it were rendered practical. He had in his hand the evidence which was given by some of the Christian Brothers before the Commissioners of 1868, and, with the permission of the House, he would read what some of them said—

> "Brother Grace, the acting Director of the Richmond Street Schools, Dublin, objects to the examination and classification of the Brothers."

Professor Sullivan put this question—

> "9,698. Professor Sullivan—With respect to the general question, would there be any objection to the examination and classification of your body by any external authority? Brother Grace answers—I would never submit to such a process. It would not become us as a religious body; our training is such as we consider quite equal to any we could get outside. We have the training and classification in our own hand, and I don't see why external parties should seek to come and decide upon that which we have already settled."

That was the spirit with which the House had to deal. Again, Brother Grace was asked by Professor Sullivan—

> "9,700. Then, if afterwards it was found possible to connect your schools to the Government, so as to receive Government aid, would you forego the advantages of payment by classification, and rest satisfied with payment for results alone?—I would sooner submit to an injustice than allow the members of our body, who are religious men, trained and brought up for years to our method of teaching, to be submitted for examination and classification to an external body."

Now, all that showed that the House did wisely, when it ceased its connection with, and its pretended supervision of, the College of Maynooth. But what were they doing now? They were proposing to revert to that which experience condemned—the attempt to establish educational supervision over Monastic and Conventual institutions in 50 cases. He thought that at length hon. Members were beginning to see the relation of his argument to the Question immediately before the House. Hon. Members seemed determined, if possible, to pass the Bill without its effect being known by the country. Her Majesty's Government, in order to carry the Bill, had cleared the House of their oldest supporters, as was apparent by their absence. The front Opposition Bench was positively empty! Why was that the case? Because right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that the same objections which had existed for years to Governmental connection with the Roman Catholic institutions, which had for years prevailed against the Maynooth Grant, continued strong and rife among the English and Scotch constituencies; many hon. Members, therefore, sought to be excused from voting on this occasion. The House might thus be cleared, and at the end of the Session a connection between the State and these Monastic and Conventual institutions might be instituted, to which the people of England and Scotland and the Protestants of Ireland had always objected; the House might thus depart from the great principle upon which the system of primary education in Ireland had been established. They might do all this; but he was determined, by dividing the House on the Amendment, that hon. Members present should declare by their votes whether they preferred the connection through these grants between the Legislature and those Monastic and Conventual institutions, to adopting the more tolerant principles upon which the Queen's Colleges were founded. He lamented that any hon. Members of that House appeared to be prepared to vote that they would not leave unchallenged and uninterfered with the right of parents to direct the education of their children, by rejecting the principle that, when they awarded prizes, or provided for prizes being awarded, to successful examinees, the payment should not be made to the successful candidate; that it should not be made to his parent or next of kin, but should be made to the conductors of the school in which the candidate was being educated, thereby involving themselves in a connection to which the great body of the people of England and Scotland had always objected, and to which the Protestants of Ireland also, before they were politically crushed, had always objected; he should regret the decision of the House, if the majority should choose, against the teaching of experience, to incur great difficulties rather than adhere to the simple principle of paying to the examinee the reward of his success, and leaving his parents to settle the method of his education as a matter between themselves and the managers of the schools.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that the question of results fees had been so fully discussed at an earlier stage of the Bill that he did not propose to follow his hon. Friend through the objections he had taken to the measure, seeing that he (the Attorney General for Ireland) considered that the system proposed in regard to payments by results was in the main deserving of their support. The question was hardly looked at in a reasonable way by his hon. Friend. Results fees could be looked at from two points of view. First, suppose there were no results fees to be paid at all, what would be the effect upon the education of the country? Surely, the only boys that would present themselves, or be prepared for examination, would be the ablest and brightest boys in the schools. If, however, they were to be paid, surely, if the masters were able to turn out boys creditably, it was but reasonable that they should be entitled to a moderate amount in the shape of results fees. The most powerful argument for the system was the benefit which would accrue to the average, or what might be called the stupid boy. By offering a powerful incentive, the master was induced to devote his energies on the average boy, so that an examination grant might be obtained, instead of cramming clever boys only. That appeared to him (the Attorney General for Ireland) to be the commonsense way of looking at the question, and on that ground he hoped the House would support the Bill.

MR. SHAW, as one of the crushed Protestants to whom the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had alluded, had no hesitation in supporting the Bill, which he looked upon as one that would be of exceeding advantage to Ireland, and to Protestants as well as Roman Catholics. Many of the schools in which formerly boys of Protestant parents were educated and prepared for College had disappeared, and he knew that in several places it was in contemplation to set up those schools again; but it would not be possible to do so if the proposal of the Bill as to results fees was rejected. The Bill interfered as little as possible with the prejudices of the country, and he thoroughly approved of it, believing it to be one of those happy thoughts that pleased nearly everyone. There could be little doubt that even the Dissenting community, if they were appealed to, would be found to be in its favour, for the only resolutions that had been carried against the Bill were those of separate Presbyteries and not the whole Body. Indeed, the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) seemed to be quite unaware of the fact that the Methodist Body of Ireland, who lately held a meeting in Dublin, refused to pass a vote condemning the Bill. It was conceded on all sides that there was a good case for legislation, and he wished to know what the opponents of the Bill would propose to substitute in its stead? If they brought forward a Bill to cut off the right arms of the whole of the people of Ireland, it would be thought a most monstrous thing; but by denying the opportunities of education, they were stunting the minds of the people. He regarded the measure as an earnest, an honest, and a true effort to promote the cause of education in Ireland, and as time went on he believed it would produce great results.

MR. COURTNEY said, he wished to point out that the Bill contained no definition of the word "manager," and that no attempt had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to define it. That was the first difficulty. The second difficulty was that there was no inspection except in a very limited sense, and how were they to judge of management without efficient inspection? The moment the system of payment by results was introduced, they lost all control over the schools. The Bill did not make its appearance until April, and it was not brought forward again until the energies of the House were exhausted by a protracted Session, and they saw the extraordinary spectacle of a House, three-fourths of which were Irish Members, who could, if it were competent for them to do so, carry a Motion in favour of Home Rule. No doubt the Bill would be carried, but it would open up the way to endless difficulties. In fact, it was like opening up one of the seals in the Revelations. The simplest way was to cut out this proviso. The real question was, whether the method of payment by results was as convenient and as expedient in the cause of education as it was undeniably novel? In his view, that was certainly not the case; and to a great extent he agreed with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, when he had spoken of the difficulties which would result from the Bill. Was it necessary that all the difficulties attendant on the relations between the State and the schools should be created? There could be no such necessity; and the troubles that would follow might easily be obviated by rewarding the pupils themselves rather than their teachers. That plan would give an equal stimulus to education, and would be in every way preferable to the system that would be established by the Bill.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, constant references had been made to a speech he delivered four years ago, in which it was said that he stated the results fees involved such difficulties that no Ministry would think of introducing them. The position was that when he brought the measure before the House, he was anxious to bring it forward in as simple and inviting a manner as possible. There was not the slightest foundation for the argument that results fees involved concurrent endowment, that private venture schools in the Irish towns had gone out of existence, and that they would be resuscitated by results fees. The results fees constituted the most important and the most necessary part of this Bill, if teachers were to pay fair attention to ordinary pupils, instead of concentrating their attention on those likely to earn prizes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had endangered the passing of the Bill by countenancing the opposition to results fees; but his absence indicated that he had changed his opinion, and had made a second mistake in connection with Irish education. Not a penny of the results fees would go to the funds of religious Bodies, some of whom conducted schools at a loss; but they would be expended upon libraries, or other means of improving the general education. They tolerated denominationalism in elementary schools, for the schools were Protestant or Catholic according as the majority of the population were one or the other; and the protest against it in intermediate education could come only from the determined foes of middle-class schools in Ireland.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that the question had been fairly argued in Committee, and that result fees were paid at the primary education schools. With reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), he must say the Irish Members present, all told, were 49; and it did not require to be a Second Wrangler to know that 49 were not three-fourths of 129. He contended that because some £3 or £4 a-year should be paid to the managers of schools, instead of to the boys, it would not create that plague and pestilence all over Ireland which some hon. Members seemed to imagine would be the case.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 110; Noes 24: Majority 86.—(Div. List, No. 272.)

MR. SULLIVAN claimed the indulgence of the House while he stated that inadvertently he had voted with the minority. He had been writing in the Library, and when he entered the House he did not hear the Question put, and through mistaken information he went into the wrong Lobby. He wished to know whether any alteration could be made in the record?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was in a similar predicament. He had not a particle of sympathy with the objects of the minority.

MR. SPEAKER said, there was no mode by which the record of the vote could be altered. Both the hon. Members having been in the House when the Question was put, the result of their votes must be recorded as they were given.

Clause 6 (Rules to be made by Board).

MR. CHARLES LEWIS moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 32, after "examination," to add—

> "And for payment of the necessary expenses of juveniles and subsistence of students to, from, and at the place of examination."

The Amendment was intended to provide for the encouragement and assistance of poor scholars.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 32, after the word "examination," to add the words "and for payment of the necessary expenses of journeys and subsistence of students to, from, and at the place of examination."—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. J. LOWTHER opposed the Amendment. It would open up a source of unlimited expense.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. COURTNEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 33, to omit the words "as far as conveniently may be." The object of the Amendment was as far as possible to prevent the Board of Commissioners from making any Order giving boys any advantage over girls in regard to the benefit of the Bill. He believed that as the Bill stood originally, and before those words were inserted, boys and girls stood on the same footing; but those words seemed to suggest that the girls were to wait until the boys were fully provided for. That ought not to be the case. The two sexes should be placed on a footing of perfect equality, and it was principally to elicit from the Government a declaration that that was their intention that he had moved the Amendment. It was said that there was not sufficient money to provide adequately for both boys and girls, and that it was not desirable to limit the assistance to be given to boys. But he believed that that idea was founded on a misconception. He did not think more than 2,000 boys would pass in three subjects, and obtain pass certificates, &c. At the most, those boys could not obtain more than £100,000 in result fees for their schools. Then, calculating that it might be assumed no more than £8,000 a-year would be required for exhibitions, that made £18,000 to be given to boys. Then, taking the extravagant estimate of £10,000 a-year for management, that would make £28,000, leaving £7,000 for the girls; but he did not believe that anything like that expenditure on boys could take place without a reduction of the standard of examination beyond any reasonable level. If that were so, there would be a still larger sum disposable for girls. Girls were admitted to the local examinations set on foot by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge with this result—that the number of girls competing in the senior class was greater than that of the boys, and the same was the case in respect to those who passed with honours. The figures connected with the examination of girls in connection with these examinations were conclusive as to their capacity to stand, and even to succeed, in the same examination as boys. The Queen's University and Trinity College had started examinations for girls precisely the same as for boys, and he had been told that 360 girls had obtained certificates from Trinity College, and 230 from the Queen's University. Why, then, if there was money available, should not girls be examined in the same way and on the same subject as boys? It was said that it was sufficient if young women were instructed in needle-work and cooking. He did not at all undervalue those acquirements in the education of women; but if they were not to be taught anything else, then, logically, it ought to be sufficient to educate boys in merely carpentry and farming. The object in both cases was not to inculcate special technical knowledge, but to develop the mind and the mental capacity. In both cases, the same training was equally applicable, and he should move the Amendment, with a view of eliciting from the Government an assurance that such an application should be made.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 33, to leave out the words "as far as conveniently may be."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, when the words were brought forward in Committee, they were approved by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) and others who took an interest in the education of girls. In fact, with the exception of the hon. Member for Liskeard, all the friends of female education were content with the Bill as it stood. He believed, also, that ladies who had adopted the cause of the higher education of their sex were disposed to acquiesce. The hon. Member for Liskeard, however, was more Loyalist than the King. The words to which the hon. Gentleman objected were not his (Mr. Lowther's); they were taken from the 12th section of another Statute—that relating to English Endowed Schools—in which they had been found to work well and without injustice to girls. What was intended by the words to which the hon. Gentleman objected was, not that girls should be placed at a disadvantage as compared with boys, but that the Commissioners should make reasonable rules for the examination of girls, and the grant of exhibitions to them.

MR. HOPWOOD supported the Amendment, the principle of which was to deprive the Commissioners of anything like an option in the matter, and to impose it upon them as a duty to make provision for the education of girls. The words proposed to be left out might be applicable enough in a measure dealing with old endowments; but were altogether inapplicable to a measure which proposed to establish new endowments, forming, as they did, an unworthy condition, tending in the direction of restricting female education.

MR. BUTT said, that the cry for intermediate education which had arisen in Ireland had no reference whatever to girls. The complaint was that the education of young men, who had to bear the brunt and battle of life, and whose education in that respect was of more importance than the education of girls, ought to have provision made for it. When this Bill passed the House of Lords, there was not the slightest intention of providing for the education of girls. ["No, no!"] Whoever said "No" had paid very little attention to the passing of the Bill. The meaning of the Amendment was to place the education of girls and of boys on precisely the same footing; but if that duty were imposed on the Commissioners, they would be involved in very difficult questions. There were some hon. Members in that House who were too fond of assuming that public opinion was always on their side, and in favour of every crotchet they took up—and he could assure the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), who, perhaps, knew less of public opinion in Ireland than he did, that there was no desire in that country to spend money in order to give exactly the same class of education to girls as to boys. The question of girls' education might be made the subject of a distinct Bill, to be considered next Session; but the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard would destroy the real use of the present measure. There was a strong objection to raising questions of this nature at that late stage of the Bill, and he hoped that the Government would not give way upon the point, but would adhere to the Bill as it stood, leaving the Commissioners to exercise their discretion in the matter.

MR. HERSCHELL denied that the Lords had passed the Bill with the clear understanding that it was not to apply to the education of girls. On the contrary, when Earl Granville was about to propose an Amendment in that direction, he was assured by the Lord Chancellor that the Bill as it stood might be applied by the Board equally to the education of girls as to that of boys. He had the very best authority for that statement.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS protested against the charge that had been brought against those who objected to the Bill as it stood, that they were resorting to obstruction to get rid of it. When that measure, of the greatest public importance, was being discussed, the front Opposition Bench was entirely empty; and therefore it was the duty of those who opposed the Bill as it stood to do their best to enforce their views on the matter, without succumbing to the terrorism which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had resorted to. Everyone knew that the hon. and learned Member was one of the fathers of the Bill, and that the whole thing had been settled between him and Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BUTT denied that he had resorted to terrorism, and stated that he represented no views on this question but his own and those of the Irish people. All he had done was to enter his protest against Amendments of this nature being introduced into the Bill at that late stage instead of in Committee, and thus endangering the measure.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN was rather astonished at this display of warm enthusiasm on the part of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis). He had promised that if the opportunity afforded, he would do what he could to support the claims of women in this matter; but he could not support little Amendments of this character, which might have the effect of imperilling the Bill, and which would never have been introduced as questions of principle if they had not been intended to interfere with the measure now that the House was within four days of the close of the Session. Power ought to be given to teach women in Ireland especially music and drawing, for which they had the greatest capacity, and thus to enable them to earn a livelihood. He would support any proposition to secure that object. He trusted an opportunity would be given in a future Session to amend the Bill in that respect.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD suggested that, as the words in question were unnecessary, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland should consent to omit them. In his opinion, that might be done without materially affecting the Bill, and he believed it would carry out the object of the Government more completely to do so.

Mr. FAWCETT did not think that anyone would accuse him of desiring to hinder the passing of the Bill; but he was bound to say he was inclined to think that if any hon. Member of the House had done more than another to effect that purpose, that Member was the hon. and learned Gentleman who represented Limerick (Mr. Butt). That hon. and learned Gentleman ought to know the House sufficiently well to be aware that of all the expedients which could possibly be adopted to interfere with the progress of a Bill, none was so likely to succeed as the unfortunate tone which he had taken of assuming that every person who desired to amend a particular measure was in reality an enemy to it in disguise. Those who were endeavouring to make the present Bill as good a Bill as possible were in no degree responsible for its being considered on Report on the 12th of August. But there was no decreed necessity why the House should rise on any particular day; and they were bound to consider carefully every part of the measure, though the 12th of August had been reached. The Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney) raised a question of undoubted importance, and that Amendment he supported. He did not say that in administering for educational purposes the funds of the disendowed Church of Ireland the Commissioners to be appointed under the Bill should lay down any hard-and-fast line declaring that women must be educated exactly in the same way as men, and pass exactly the same examinations as men; but he did say the Commissioners ought to bear in mind that they were just as much bound to look after the education of the women of Ireland as they were to attend to the education of the men of that country. Those funds were as much the property of the women as of the men of Ireland, and he contended that in their administration there should be no distinction of sex.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 123; Noes 32: Majority 91.—(Div. List, No. 273.)

Mr. J. LOWTHER moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 5, at end, to add—

"No candidate shall be allowed to obtain a pass, nor be awarded any exhibition, prize, or certificate at any examination under this Act, unless he satisfies the examiners that he possesses an adequate knowledge of one at least of the first, second, or fourth divisions of the subjects mentioned in the Schedule of this Act."

The O'CONOR DON hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would fully explain the meaning of his Amendment, because it raised a very important question. Under the first division, it was proposed to include the ancient languages of Greece and Rome, and also, if the Board thought fit, the Celtic language. What he required to know was, whether it was intended that the Board should have the power, under the Amendments which would come on subsequently, to place the Celtic language on exactly the same footing as Greek and Latin; whether it was intended that the passing in the Celtic language would apply to conditions? He now proposed that the candidates must obtain a pass in a subject under the 1st section.

Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he had placed on the Paper an Amendment which was somewhat similar in character to the right hon. Gentleman's. Ireland had, even in remote ages, the highest reputation for its scholarsaip—so great a name had one of her scholars—Scotus—on the Continent, that it used to be said at Salamanca—"Qui scit Scotum, scit totum." He was not disposed to allow that scholastic reputation to be lowered by the provisions of the Bill, and it was, therefore, that he embodied in an Amendment the making a condition precedent to obtaining a prize a knowledge of either Greek, Latin, or mathematics.

The right hon. Gentleman proposed to make it imperative that the students should not only have a knowledge of Greek and Latin and mathematics, but that they should also possess a knowledge of the Celtic language, of Irish history, and of English history. Now, the Celtic language was, for all material purposes, except so far as regarded its connection with theology and ancient history, as much a dead language as Latin and Greek. ["No, no!"] He would ask any hon. Member to tell him whether a shopkeeper or farmer was likely to send his son to learn the Celtic language, at a cost of £60 a-year, when he had the opportunity of learning French and German, which would be so much more useful to him in after-life; and did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that in any of the 32 counties of Ireland, except in portions of Mayo, Kerry, and Galway, shopkeepers would send their sons to learn the Celtic language for the purpose of obtaining prizes? He remembered in 1846-7, in some parts of Ireland—Mayo, for instance—the Celtic language was generally spoken; but being in the same district 20 years after, he found a knowledge of the ancient language confined to the oldest inhabitants. He need not say the last thing he would attempt would be to discredit the Celtic language or literature. His name would save him from such an imputation; but the question must be looked at practically, and it would be a farce to suppose that in this utilitarian age parents would pay for education not likely to be useful to their sons in official or commercial life. To say that the Bill would result in boys learning the Celtic language was a delusion, and he was sick of delusions. The knowledge of mathematics, Greek, and Latin, however, was necessary to true scholarship.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, the particular Amendment suggested by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was really a very small matter, which ought not to give rise to much discussion. It was suggested to his right hon. Friend that as many more people knew Latin than knew Greek, those two languages should be placed in separate divisions, while the claims of Celtic should be recognized in the curriculum. His right hon. Friend, therefore, proposed to add to the language, literature, and history of Rome, the Celtic language, literature, and history. Thus, in his opinion, the claim of the Irish language would be fairly recognized.

Mr. O'CONNOR POWER said, the hon. Baronet (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had made an attack on the Celtic language. [Sir Patrick O'Brien: No!] He, and those who agreed with him, had made no exaggerated claim for the Irish language and literature, and he agreed with the hon. Baronet that it might not be of so much importance as Latin or Greek; but the Irish people still spoke it, and that was an argument in favour of teaching it. More than four-fifths of the people of Mayo spoke it daily, and in the interest of education, it was desirable to hold out such inducements as would lead the people to take advantage of it. The hon. Baronet was the only Member of that House who had attempted to crush the first efforts of Parliament to revive the study of the Celtic language, to which the English people owed so much, and he trusted that the hon. Baronet would find himself in quite an isolated position on a division. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had withdrawn from the engagement he first made with reference to that language, and had now brought forward a proposal for which nobody was prepared. He (Mr. O'Connor Power), however, thought that the Celtic ought to be placed in the same category as the other modern languages, and in that intermediate position after the study of French and German to which it was justly entitled.

Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN explained that he had never intended to deride or decry a knowledge of the Celtic literature. He merely alluded to the fact that it was not likely to be made a subject for pass under this Bill.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Mr. E. JENKINS moved the insertion of words, providing that the Board should define what persons should be deemed to be managers entitled to receive payment of result fees.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 8, after the word "fees," to insert the words "and for defining what persons shall be considered to be managers in order to be entitled to receive payment of result fees."—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he was at a loss to understand the purport of the Amendment.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, what was intended was that the result fees should be paid to the de facto managers, whoever they might be, and it might well be left to the Board to deal with the question. If a master was his own manager, he would, of course, be entitled to receive the fees.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS said, that out of respect for the convenience of hon. Members opposite, and also from a desire not to obstruct the Bill unreasonably, he would take the sense of the House upon only one other Amendment. That was to insert words giving powers to the Board to make rules for the inspection of schools the managers of which received any payment under the Act.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 11, after the word "Schedule," to insert the words "for the inspection of the schools the managers of which receive any payments under this Act."—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, that if the hon. and learned Member looked at the clause referring to inspection, he would find that the Board had absolute power to accomplish all the objects he had in view. To introduce the words of the Amendment would limit and restrict those powers, and they were, therefore, not only unnecessary, but might be injurious.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 119: Majority 99.—(Div. List, No. 274.)

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 18, to leave out the words "within forty days after the same shall have been so laid before it," in order to insert the words "before the end of the Session." The hon. and learned Member said, great powers were given to the Board by the Bill. Amongst other powers, he found that the power was given of making provision to carry out the rules in the Schedule of this Act, and for varying, altering, and amending the rules. That was a legislative power. He had no doubt it was the intention of the Government to give the House a real control over the action of the Board. If that was their intention, he had no doubt they would agree with him that such an intention could not be fairly carried out by the provisions of the Bill as they now appeared, for 40 days was not enough to enable the Legislature to interfere with effect. He proposed that, instead of limiting the rights of Parliament to 40 days, they should be exercised at any time within the Session. He would not detain the House with any further observations, but trusted that the Government would adopt the Amendment, as its object must be identical with theirs.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 18, to leave out from the word "within" to the word "before," inclusive, in order to insert the words "before the end of such Session of."—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

Mr. J. LOWTHER thought it would be unadvisable to make the Amendment suggested. As the hon. and learned Gentleman was aware, there were precedents for the form which had been adopted. Under these circumstances, he saw no reason to alter the clause as it stood in the Bill.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD said, his only reason for wishing to add the words was to give Parliament a real control in the matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. J. LOWTHER moved, as an Amendment, in the Schedule, page 5, line 33, to insert "either separately or together with the Celtic language or literature." He said, that an understanding had been arrived at with the Committee that the Celtic language should be made part of the curriculum.

The reason for making the present Amendment was, that the French, German, and Italian languages, literature, and history, formed a class of studies, and it was necessary to add—"either separately or together with the Celtic language or literature"—that was to say, that the Celtic language should not be made a distinct subject by itself.

The O'CONOR DON thought that the simplest plan would have been to have placed the Celtic language on the same level with the other languages mentioned in the Schedule. As now proposed, the Celtic language would not be placed on an equality with the others; it was only an addition which might or might not be taken up. It was not quite clear what advantages would be derived from taking it up, and it seemed to him that all that was promised was that a candidate who took up Celtic should not lose any marks for so doing. There was, therefore, no advantage offered for studying the language.

Mr. O'DONNELL observed, that in the Queen's Colleges, the Celtic language was made so entirely a side study that it really was not included in the general studies. The result was that the Celtic language had ceased to be studied; and he was very much afraid that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would be just as useless in the intermediate education of Ireland as the provision for the study of Celtic in the Queen's Colleges, and that its only effect would be to make Irish a sort of side study, which would not be taken up. He felt assured that the Amendment would not be of the slightest practical effect in promoting the study of Irish, and he could not but think that its passing would only give a purely illusory satisfaction to Irish national sentiment.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL would like to be informed what was the Celtic language? The Celtic language, he believed, was the Gaelic. He came from a part of the country where the Celtic language was used—the Irish, and the Welsh, and the Gaelic spoken in Scotland, were all Celtic languages.

Mr. PARNELL observed, that he saw no advantage in the Amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the hon. Member that he had already spoken on the subject before the House.

Mr. PARNELL stated that he merely wished to ask a question.

Mr. COURTNEY said, there was no such thing as the Celtic language. Many languages came under that head, and, as the Bill stood, it was difficult to know which was meant; though if the Irish language were mentioned, it would be clear. He was sure that no single boy in Ireland would be competent to undergo an examination in the Celtic languages.

Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA apprehended that all that would be effected by this clause would be to add a subject to the list of studies in which marks could be obtained. The number of marks to be raised for Celtic was not prescribed, and it would be one part of the duty of the Board to fix the particular number of marks that would be given for proficiency in the Celtic language. It would be much better if the language were called Irish, for nothing was more clear than that the Celtic language was sub-divided into several others — the Welsh, the Breton, and the Irish and Scotch dialects. The Irish people were anxious that there should be a certain amount of instruction in the Irish language, and, therefore, he thought that it was right that there should be power to award a certain number of marks for proficiency in it.

Mr. O'CONNOR POWER observed, that after all that had been said on the subject, it would be scarcely right to pass a clause that would be inoperative. The Government should pass a provision that would encourage the study of the Irish language. No Irish Member of the House used the word Celtic in speaking of it; everyone was satisfied with the word Irish, and yet the word Celtic had been introduced by the Government. Their Amendment simply said that a knowledge of Celtic would not be a disqualification; but there was no encouragement to the study of Irish, unless it were in the provision for instruction in the "language, literature, and history of Great Britain and Ireland." He would call the attention of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Conor Don) to that sentence, and would ask him what would be its effect upon the study of the Irish language? If it did not cover the claim they had put forward, then he should be very much disposed to object to the Amendment. It was not desirable that the Bill should be passed in a shape which would be likely to give rise to misunderstanding.

The O'CONOR DON did not think that the clause referred to included the Irish language. The hon. Member for Newry (Mr. W. Whitworth) had distinctly laid it down on the second reading of the Bill that the language of Great Britain and Ireland was the English language.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. COURTNEY proposed, as an Amendment, that students should not be permitted to hold exhibitions amounting to more than £80 per annum; he thought £100, the limit fixed, was excessive.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 37, after the word "endowment," to add the words "when the joint annual value of such scholarships, exhibition, or prizes shall exceed £80."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. J. LOWTHER thought that the limit fixed by the clause was the best.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. MELDON said, he did not intend to move the Amendment which stood in his name with regard to National School Teachers. The object that he had in view had been attained, and the slur which would have been cast on teachers had been removed.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, all the Amendments to the Bill had been disposed of; and as the Session was now nearly at an end, he hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CHARLES LEWIS said, that if there were the slightest chance of substantially adding to the number of hon. Members who opposed this Bill at the third reading, he should feel it his duty to object to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman; but he did not desire to throw any factious impediments in the way of Public Business, or to carry his opposition to the Bill to an undue extent. He had done his best to oppose the Bill, and he had failed. He was satisfied, though still protesting against the Bill, that it would be useless to oppose the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

Bill read the third time, and passed, with Amendments.

INCLOSURE PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL—[Lords]—[Bill 192.]

(Sir Matthew Ridley).

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th August], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Inclosure Provisional Orders Bill).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. E. JENKINS moved that the Order be postponed till after the other Orders of the Day. He wished to protest against the unusual course taken by the Government in putting the second reading of the Appropriation Bill in the place it occupied among the last of the Orders of the Day. The consequence was that it would be impossible for hon. Members who had Motions down before it to enter into discussions upon them. He wished also to protest against the Government trying to carry the Bishoprics Bill through on the back of the Consolidated Fund Bill. The Bishoprics Bill was a very important Bill, and one to which many hon. Members had the strongest objection. It was extremely unusual for the Appropriation Bill not to be placed on the Paper as the first Order of the Day.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON seconded the Amendment. He said, that he had had a Motion on the Paper for some time; but, unfortunately, he had been prevented by other important debates taking precedence of it from bringing it before the House. If he did not bring it forward that evening, he did not see what chance he should have of doing so that Session, and he was particularly desirous that the subject should be brought forward. Those who naturally took a great interest in having his Motion in reference to the death of Mr. C. C. Ogle, The Times Correspondent, properly and fairly discussed, had intrusted him with the duty of bringing it before the House, and he had pledged himself to bring it forward that Session. Unless the Government could promise him another day, he must bring it forward that night.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate be postponed till after the other Orders of the Day." — (Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. FAWCETT inquired, whether he was precluded from moving his Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER said, that the House had now before it a Motion. If it were passed, the Bill would go down to the bottom of the Orders of the Day, and when it was called on the hon. Member would be entitled to move his Amendment.

MR. FAWCETT asked, whether, if the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. E. Jenkins) was not carried, he should be at liberty to move the Resolution he had put down?

MR. SPEAKER said, that no doubt, in that case, the hon. Member would be precluded from moving it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped that under the circumstances the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) would consent to withdraw his Motion for postponing the Bill, because it would certainly be very unfair and very inconvenient to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) who had had this subject under his consideration for a very long time, and who had got a Notice on the Paper, if he should be precluded from moving it. He was ready to say, in answer to the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson), that he fully recognized the importance of the question the hon. Member wished to bring forward, and he would undertake to place one of the stages of the Appropriation Bill in such a position as would enable the hon. Member to bring it forward when there would be a fair opportunity of having it discussed.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked, that the hon. Member (Mr. E. Jenkins), in making his Motion, which he hoped would be withdrawn, had not stated that it had been almost invariably the custom of the House to take all the stages of the Appropriation Bill at a very early hour of the evening. He hoped that they were not now making a precedent for the future. He had not wished to interrupt the proceedings of the House at an early hour that evening; but he might now state that he had found that for a good many years the Order for the Appropriation Bill had never been delayed by more than a quarter of an hour or half an hour's debate. Neither in its second reading or Committee stage had it been taken at a later hour than 8 o'clock, and he hoped they were not about to establish a precedent for a different course.

MR. E. JENKINS consented to withdraw his Motion.

MR. H. SAMUELSON begged to say that he should certainly accept with pleasure the courtesy offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who always treated Gentlemen on that side in the most courteous manner; but he should be obliged if the right hon. Gentleman would inform him when he should be able to bring his Motion on? There was sometimes a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip, and he should like to be sure of his opportunity.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the difficulty in which they were placed was that some little time ago he gave Notice that they would take the Indian Budget as the first Order on Tuesday. If he were to place the Committee on the Appropriation Bill before that Order, he was afraid it would be a breach of faith towards those hon. Gentlemen who wished to deal with that question. What he proposed to do, therefore, was to place the third reading of the Appropriation Bill as the first Order for Wednesday.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. FAWCETT moved—

> "That it is inexpedient to proceed with this Bill until evidence has been obtained from disinterested witnesses as to the desirability of sanctioning the proposed inclosures, and until the obstacles which impede the application of the Clauses for the regulation of Commons, contained in the Commons Act of 1876, have been removed by the Commons Regulation Expenses Bill now passing through Parliament."

The hon. Member said, he was extremely sorry, at that late hour of the night, to trespass on the attention of the House, and, as he felt it was absolutely impossible to deal with the subject fully, he should reserve the greater part of the observations he had intended to make until the third reading. He could not be in a worse position than he was at that moment, and he would briefly explain to the House what that position was. The Bill proposed to inclose close upon 6,000 acres of land. Out of that 6,000 acres, he had no objection whatever, and he could not conceive that any hon. Member would have any objection whatever, to the inclosure of the greater portion of it—namely, about 4,900 acres. The Bill dealt with land of three classes—first of all, with common field land; secondly, with large open wide fields; and, thirdly, with two large pastures. Now, 4,900 acres of that were common field land, and to the inclosure of that he made no objection whatever. But the difficulty in which both he and the House were placed was that it was impossible to amend those Inclosure Bills. He had carefully considered every course of procedure, and he saw no way of proposing that the common land should be inclosed, and that the rest of the land should not be inclosed; and therefore he was under the necessity, much against his will, of proposing the rejection of the entire Bill. There were two points which he particularly wished to bring before the House. In the first place, he wished to say that no inclosure ought to be sanctioned by the House unless the local inquiry had obtained evidence, not only from those pecuniarily interested in the inquiry, but also from those who could look upon the question from a public point of view. Now, that position of his was clearly marked out by the Commons Act of 1876, which was passed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department; for if anyone would turn to that Act and look at Subsection 6, Clause 11, they would see that the Home Secretary distinctly contemplated that the Assistant Commissioner should not be satisfied with simply obtaining evidence from those who were pecuniarily interested, but that he also thought it desirable to obtain it from those who could take a public view of the question apart from a private and interested view. Now, in this particular case, he wished to bring no charge whatever against the Inclosure Commissioners. It was the first to be dealt with under the Act of 1876, and any omissions which were made in the inquiry, he was quite willing to admit, were not made through intention, but from accident; but still it was most important that the House should show that they were anxious that the Act of 1876 should be carried out strictly in its spirit, and he said that a fundamental principle of that Act would be absolutely disregarded unless the Commissioners took most scrupulous care to secure those public interests. Now, he believed that in that particular inquiry that care was not taken; because, when the Bill was referred to a Select Committee in the preceding year, this—the following—was unanimously their Report. That Committee was presided over by the President of the Local Government Board. The Committee distinctly reported this—"That in future cases, care should be taken to procure disinterested evidence." They could not have a more clear and distinct intimation that in this particular inquiry disinterested evidence was not taken. He would prove that by a second fact. With regard to one group of commons—namely, those of Rutlandshire, there was an inquiry held on the spot, and meetings were held. Who were present at those meetings? At the morning meeting, 18 people were present, and of those, 11 were solicitors and land agents of the large landowners, seven were freeholders, and there was not one single independent person present. At the evening meeting, the only persons present were five solicitors, some of whom were London solicitors who had come down to represent the large landowners. Now, could they possibly conceive a case in which it was more distinctly shown that the Assistant Commissioner should not be satisfied with the evidence taken, but should have given instructions that the evidence of the people of the neighbourhood should be taken? He also wished to call attention to the case of Riccall. At Riccall, 45 people were present, and out of those persons, everyone except five was pecuniarily interested in the inclosure. Of the five persons, three were tenants-at-will holding cottages under the chief person who was interested in that particular inclosure.

Therefore, it seemed to him that it was clearly shown that evidence from disinterested persons was not obtained. He did not, of course, mean to throw any suspicion upon anyone; but he did say that it was evidence given by persons who were pecuniarily interested in recommending those inclosures; and he said, therefore, that the House was not in a position to judge properly from the evidence given before the Committee. There was a second point upon which, on the third reading of the Bill, he hoped to speak at greater length, but to which he would now ask the attention of the House. He would put this to the Home Secretary. When the right hon. Gentleman was passing the Commons Act, he again and again stated—and he (Mr. Fawcett) accepted the assertion—that the object of the Bill was to promote the regulation of commons as distinguished from the inclosure of commons. When the Bill was passing through the House, although he admitted that intention, he thought that, as the Bill was drawn, there was very little chance that those regulation clauses would come into operation. The Act had now been working for a couple of years, and what some of them predicted as to the working of the regulation clauses had been abundantly verified. He made this as no charge against the Home Secretary, because, as soon as it was pointed out to him, the right hon. Gentleman lost not a moment's time in introducing a Bill to amend his Commons Act of 1876; and he believed the result of the Bill, which had now passed the House of Lords, would be to give the regulating clauses of the Commons Act of 1876 a chance of being brought into practical operation, such as they would never have had under the Bill as it stood, and that he could explain by a single sentence. If a proposal was made to regulate a common, the whole expense of it, by the Act of 1876, would be thrown upon the lords of the manor and the commoners, and so no wonder they declined to undertake the duty of imposing regulations. But now the regulations would be practically presented to them, for, by the new Bill brought in by the Home Secretary, a certain small portion of every common which was proposed to be regulated could be sold, in order to pay the expenses of the regulation. Consequently, the regulation could be carried out without throwing any cost upon those who were interested in the common, and in that way a great obstacle which stood in the way of the regulation of commons would be removed. Now, he would again put the question to the Home Secretary. He said not a word about the commons to be inclosed, but he asked him to consider the position of the 114 acres of pasture; and, if that were not regulated, he asked him whether he could possibly imagine the case of any common that would be regulated under that Act. What was the position of that 114 acres of pasture? It was right in the heart of the village. It was largely used by the villagers for the purposes of recreation. He could not conceive of a case in a rural district where they could possibly have a stronger argument in favour of a recreation ground than they had in the case of the 114 acres of pasture in the heart of a village which was largely used by the villagers for the purposes of recreation. It was never represented to them when the inquiry was held that it was possible to inclose the commons and regulate this piece of ground, for very likely if it had been so, there would have been some evidence on the other side. If the Home Secretary would consent to postpone this Bill, and see what the effect of the regulating Bill would be, and if the Assistant Commissioner would go down and say that there was no objection to inclose the common field, but that there was an objection to inclose the pasture and the open heath, he believed that under those circumstances there probably would be no opposition offered to the regulation of the pastures. He therefore desired, by the Resolution he now intended to move, to assert two principles. In the first place, that it was of the utmost importance that in those local inquiries that were held in regard to proposed inclosures, that the Act of 1876 should be faithfully carried out, and that the Assistant Commissioner should not be satisfied with simply taking the evidence of those pecuniarily interested; and, secondly, he felt that if the scheme for regulation had been presented in the way in which it could be presented now that the amending Act of 1877 had been passed, much of the opposition which was now heard against regulation would be removed, and the regulation clauses of the Act of 1876 would have a much better chance of being brought into operation than they had at the present time.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to proceed with this Bill until evidence has been obtained from disinterested witnesses as to the desirability of sanctioning the proposed inclosures, and until the obstacles which impede the application of the Clauses for the regulation of Commons, contained in the Commons Act of 1876, have been removed by the Commons Regulation Expenses Bill now passing through Parliament,"—(Mr. Fawcett,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, as Chairman of the Commons Committee which had recommended those inclosures, thought it right to say a few words. The hon. Member had made a similar proposition in Committee; but, finding himself in a minority, he had given Notice to oppose in Parliament the Bill which confirmed the Provisional Orders. He was not complaining in the slightest degree that the hon. Member had not acted with perfect fairness from his own point of view. He did not wish to go into the merits of the particular case, because they had been carefully considered last Session by the Committee to which the hon. Member referred. That Committee recommended the inclosures upon certain conditions which had been complied with by the promoters. They also appended to their Report an opinion that in cases of future Provisional Orders evidence of disinterested witnesses should be taken. Now, he confessed that to his mind the old plan of hearing only promoters and opponents was more satisfactory, and more likely to bring about the requisite effects. It was difficult to say what really disinterested evidence was. There might be persons who had no interest whatever in the inclosures, and, therefore, were not technically interested witnesses; but those persons might be actuated by prejudices or by animosity against promoters which might bias their judgment. He recollected that there was a very great feeling about rabbits in the case of one witness who came before the Committee. However that might be, the inclosures had been recommended by the Committee of last year, and it was quite clear that the Resolution was not intended to apply to those particular inclosures. It was, no doubt, the intention of the Committee to pass those inclosures, and to limit the Resolution to future cases. In fact, those particular Provisional Orders would have been passed last year; but, unfortunately, the Bill for carrying them into effect was withdrawn at the end of the Session on account of a technical informality. He thought this need not have been done. As it was, the case came again before their Committee. The informality was corrected, and the conditions were all fulfilled. When the cases were selected, as had been stated by Mr. Caird before the Committee last year, they were selected as being the most deserving, and against which no allegations whatever had been made; and they were, therefore, chosen for the purpose of being submitted to the Committee, as if to see whether any inclosures should be permitted or not. It certainly appeared to him that, if such cases were to be met by conditions more onerous and stringent than the Act itself, they would be doing a very great injustice to the promoters and owners whom they asked to come before them and make applications for inclosures. He sometimes regretted to see inclosures of land anywhere near centres of population; but as long as the law was unrepealed, it was hardly just to meet applications for inclosures in a way that almost amounted to a refusal before hearing. He thought that the proposal the hon. Member for Hackney was making to postpone the Inclosure Bill, which had already been too long delayed, was still harder—namely, in order to wait for the passing of a Bill which was not yet passed, and which, if passed, might not apply to the particular inclosures in question. He did not in the least complain that the hon. Member should have expressed what he felt so keenly; but, at the same time, he thought it would be very unfortunate if the House were to delay any longer the passing of that Bill.

Question put.

MR. FAWCETT moved to omit Riccall from the operation of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the proper place for the hon. Member to move his Amendment was on the Schedule of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Schedule.

MR. FAWCETT moved that Riccall be omitted therefrom. He did so in order to get from the Secretary of State some reason why the portion of the land proposed to be inclosed should not be regulated instead. In Riccall there were 114 acres of pasture land in the heart of the village, which were largely used by the villagers for the purpose of feeding cattle and for recreation. If that land was not to be regulated in the case of Riccall, he would ask the Home Secretary, whether he could suggest any single case in which regulation was the proper course to be taken? He had never yet heard any explanation why the particular portion of land he had mentioned should be inclosed, and not regulated.

MR. LEEMAN trusted that the Committee would refuse to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney. It had already been explained to the House by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cave) that this was a Bill for the inclosure of certain spaces, and that it had been practically before Parliament for two years. It would have been supposed from what fell from the hon. Member for Hackney, that there had been some opposition to the Bill outside himself. He (Mr. Leeman) ventured to say, and he thought he could make it clear to the House before he finished his observations, that every possible inquiry had been made into the merits and demerits of this application. There had been a Committee upon the Bill, presided over by the right hon. Gentleman, which sat last year for no less than seven days. Before that the Commissioners had had the matter advertised, and had called upon persons in the locality, and not a single person had any objection to make to the Bill, so far as Riccall was concerned. The Commissioners not only advertised the proposal, but they called upon all parties in any way interested in the locality to state any objections that could be raised to the Bill. Moreover, meetings were held, first of all in the morning, and afterwards in the evening. Upon that occasion the hon. Gentleman had told the Committee that nobody came to the meetings but those interested in the inclosure; but the whole world was invited by the advertisement to attend, and the advertisement was inserted in the various newspapers in the neighbourhood. It was provided by the Act of 1876 that great care must be taken that everyone should have the fullest opportunity of stating his objections. It was very odd that the hon. Member for Hackney exhibited so great a knowledge of Riccall; he wished the hon. Gentleman would be good enough to favour the House with all the information he possessed with regard to that place.

MR. FAWCETT said, that he had never mentioned a single fact connected with Riccall, although he had heard many facts connected with it privately; but he never mentioned a single fact that he had not obtained from Blue Books that were before the House, or from evidence that was considered by the Select Committee.

MR. LEEMAN said, that the hon. Member himself sat as one of the Committee listening to the evidence which was brought forward. If the hon. Gentleman referred to a Blue Book for the proceeding he was now taking, let him show the Committee that every Member of the Select Committee voted against him, when the subject was before them; and that, by this overwhelming majority, the Committee voted in favour of the particular inclosure now before the House. The Committee made certain stipulations that additional quantities of land should be inserted in the Provisional Orders to what had been originally inserted; but when that was done, every Member of this Committee, with the exception of the hon. Gentleman, voted for the Bill being passed. And why were they not passed last Session? It was simply because technicalities were found to exist, and the Inclosure Commissioners had to withdraw the Bill. But, said the hon. Gentleman, the Committee had passed a Resolution that on all future occasions, the Commissioners should call before them what had been termed disinterested witnesses. But, nevertheless, the Committee had voted that these Bills should be passed through the House. What took place afterwards? After the different owners of property affected to the extent of some 6,000 acres had made the alterations required by the Committee and the Commissioners had made the Provisional Orders required by Act of Parliament, it was necessary that the matter should come for confirmation before the House. There was not a living soul had any idea of opposing the application. No one knew that better than the hon. Member for Hackney, and yet he now sought to exclude Riccall. Months went over, after the Committee came to the resolution mentioned, and the labouring classes in the village of Riccall, which contained some 800 persons, were in expectation of the passing of the Bill. It was proved before the Committee that those were the persons most interested in the inclosure, and those men had been waiting for months in expectation that they would speedily have this Provisional Order as regarded Riccall put in force. But suddenly there turned up in the village of Riccall a man whom no one knew anything at all about. When he arrived, people said—"What are you doing here?" He asked—"Are any of you opposed to this inclosure?" No one was aware of any opposition. Then he said—"I am a gentleman from the 'Anti-Inclosure Suburban Commons Association.' If you listen to me and follow the advice I am about to give you, I shall be able to do you some good." That person—who it turned out afterwards came from London—laid birdlime, into which some persons walked, and he would tell the Committee who they were. They were the men who, in former years, had been owners of cottages in which they lived, and to which commonable rights were attached, which they had sold and got the value of. The agent of the "Anti-Inclosure Suburban Commons Association" induced those persons to believe that he could bring about the regulation of a part of the common, instead of inclosure. He therefore induced those persons to walk into the birdlime he set, and 18 of those persons were dishonest enough to sign a document called a Petition to the House of Commons. The rest of the persons interested thought it was scarcely fair that they should have been paid for their commonable rights, and yet keep the land uninclosed. But, oddly enough, there was a Petition, of which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney had some knowledge, for he moved before the Committee this year that the resolution to which it had come should not be confirmed until the Assistant Commissioners had been examined as to whether the recommendation of the Committee as to obtaining evidence from disinterested parties had been carried out, and until a certain Petition from Riccall against the inclosure of commons had been considered. The hon. Member was thus aware of that Petition. He (Mr. Leeman) had searched the records of that period, but could not discover the Petition. If that Petition were not produced, upon whose authority was it that the hon. Gentleman was making the statements he now did with regard to Riccall? The hon. Gentleman himself was never in Riccall in his life, so far as he (Mr. Leeman) knew. There were several reasons why the people of Riccall should have wished for this inclosure to take place, and their wish was evident, notwithstanding the efforts of the "Anti-Inclosure Suburban Commons Association." The land at Riccall was, to a very great extent, swampy, and the particular 114 acres of pasture to which the hon. Member had alluded was called the "Riccall Dam." The Committee took far greater care of these people's rights than would be done by the Anti-Inclosure Association. When they came to ask for Petitions, they found one presented by about 120 of the labouring population of Riccall, who were conscious that if the inclosure did not take place, the land in question would continue in its present bad state; whereas the inclosure would involve an expense of £15,000 in the reclamation of the land, which would go into the pockets of the labouring population. Did the hon. Member consider what he was doing in preventing that money from being spent for the benefit of the people of Riccall? He (Mr. Leeman) was describing a locality which he knew well, for it was within half-an-hour of his own place, and he stated his deliberate opinion that the inclosure ought to take place. The hon. Member said he did not object to the arable land and common field land being inclosed; but he proposed to stop the Bill for another year, because, upon his own showing only, there happened to be 114 acres of land in Riccall which he did not think should be inclosed. Why was this inclosure asked for with respect to the other land? There were between 600 and 700 acres of land in Riccall held in common between something like 45 owners, each man holding from six perches to about six acres; the land was close to the River Ouse, and required extensive draining. The inclosure was one of which everyone had had notice, and which, but for the hon. Member, would have taken place years ago. The 144 acres was part of the common land, and like the other portion, was lowlying, having a porous surface and a clay sub-soil. It was proved before the Committee by independent witnesses, consisting of the most eminent agriculturists in Yorkshire, that the drainage operations on that common would take three to five years to carry out. Did the hon. Member think that the labouring classes of Riccall considered that he was doing them any good in objecting to this expenditure of £15,000? Rather, he should have thought, that after having done all in his power to oppose the inclosure the hon. Member for Hackney would have been satisfied to have let the Bill pass without keeping hon. Members in town for the purpose of supporting the Bill. The discussion of this subject was a pure waste of time, and he called upon the hon. Member to show the Petition which he had mentioned, and the Committee would then be able to see the value of the objection. The people of Riccall had petitioned the House in favour of the Bill; and he, therefore, with some confidence, opposed the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. FAWCETT observed, that it was quite impossible for him, at that time of night, to answer the hon. Gentleman's arguments at length. He had no motive for his criticism, except that derived from the impression produced on him when this question came before the Committee. His hon. Friend waxed extremely indignant with him, though he had only spoken from the sincerest motives; but he must remember, when he spoke with such unwonted enthusiasm, that he spoke as a professional advocate. He spoke for the lord of the manor, and he (Mr. Fawcett) spoke from a public point of view. The Petition to which his hon. Friend referred was not drawn up for presentation to the House, but to the Committee. He knew nothing about the Petition; but certain strong allegations were made with regard to it, and he was anxious that they should be sifted. It was proposed that the Petition should be considered by the Committee. He had known the hon. Member too long to object to-night to the strong language he had used; and as he thought he would speak in a different way after further consideration, he (Mr. Fawcett) would postpone further remarks till the third reading.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, speaking with reference to the hon. Member for Hackney's statement that the case of Riccall was one in which it appeared that it would be most convenient that the regulating clause should be applied, assured the Committee that the question of regulation was put to the witnesses over and over again. He was Chairman of the Committee, and all the witnesses agreed that there was no desire to enter into that question; but that inclosure was desired was proved by the promoters, and no objection on the part of any of the inhabitants was urged. These questions came before the Committee not so much promoted by the parties, as by the Inclosure Commissioners, who were responsible for bringing before the Committee the cases which they considered ought to be so brought. He, as Chairman of the Committee, however, was anxious that there should be no question as to the bona fides of the Commissioners, and he caused notice to be given to the inhabitants that a Committee of the House of Commons was to adjudicate in these inclosures, and that any person who had anything to say was invited to give evidence. In his opinion, a most grievous injustice would be done to those interested in the inclosures, if they were not carried out this Session.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

On Question "That the Bill be read the third time To-morrow?".

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE asked, what would be the order of Business? An unusual number of Bills still remained on the Orders, and nothing had been said as to the probable day of Prorogation. The House would lose a most important opportunity of having grievances brought forward at the close of the Session, if the Appropriation Bill were taken so late, as he feared it was likely to be, at the next Sitting. If, in fixing the Bill now before the House for that day, the Government meant the House to understand that there would be several Bills set down before the Appropriation Bill, a most unusual course would be taken. On Wednesday, when the Appropriation Bill might be the first Order, time was limited, and probably the first Motion would take up the whole day, so that the House would only have the opportunity of bringing forward one grievance. On former occasions there had always been three ample opportunities, at least, of bringing forward grievances on the Appropriation Bill. On one important subject—the attitude of the Porte towards Greece—it was most important that there should be some opportunity for debate. Information had reached him as to the Porte's reception of the directions of the Congress in regard to the Greek frontiers, which convinced him that the subject ought to be considered by the House; but he feared lest there should be no opportunity given for its consideration.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that there have been a great many opportunities this Session of bringing forward this question of the treatment of Greece. As to the Order of Business for to-day, we propose to take—first, the Committee on the Indian Budget; then, the Committee on the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill; then, the third reading of the Bishoprics Bill; then, the Inclosure Bill; and then, the third reading of the Telegraphs Bill. On Wednesday, we put the Appropriation Bill down for third reading; and I should hope that the Prorogation may take place on Friday; but, at all events, not later than Saturday.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON explained that the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had not referred to Greek questions that had already occupied the attention of the House, but to questions raised by the receipt of recent intelligence.

Bill to be read the third time Tomorrow.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Raikes.)

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND).—RESOLUTION.

Mr. MELDON rose to call attention to the claims of the Irish National Teachers; and to move—

> "That this House, having, with the assent of Her Majesty's Government on the 7th of May last passed a Resolution that the position of the Irish National Teachers called for the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government with a view to a satisfactory adjustment of their claims, this House is of opinion that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have given effect during the present Session to such Resolution, and to have made proposals to this House for securing with certainty to the Irish National School Teachers the full amount of the result fees to be earned by them in the current year."

The hon. and learned Member said, it was unprecedented that the Appropriation Bill should be brought forward at such a late hour, and he should not have brought forward his Motion then, were it not that there never was a fitter subject for discussion than the case of great hardship and injustice which he had to present. So far back as the 1st May, he moved that the claims of these teachers called for the immediate attention of the House, with a view to the satisfactory settlement of their claims. The House passed the Resolution, and he thought there was ample ground for saying that it was the duty of the Government to have given effect to such a Resolution of the House. When he added that the gist of the Resolution —namely, its demand on the immediate attention of the Government—had been the subject of discussion between himself and the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, and that the Government had assented to the Motion, after he had declined to withdraw the word "immediate," it would appear still more surprising that no steps had yet been taken by the Government. He was one of those who tried to negotiate with the Government before bringing grievances before the House, and he had put himself in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject; but he did not even respond to him. He took no notice of his reasonable demand. He called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to the subject. He was courtesy itself; but he avoided discussing what means ought to be adopted to remove the grievances of the teachers. In two or three words he would now state their case. In 1874, the full justice of the demands of the teachers were admitted. In 1875, the Government proposed a scheme, which they themselves stated was a temporary scheme. They took a Vote of £120,000 towards the payment of two-thirds of the result fees. They said—"We will give you £60,000 unconditionally. We will give you the other £60,000 on condition that the Unions of Ireland provide another £60,000." It was stated in the House that this scheme must necessarily fail, and it was urged by the Government that it would only be temporary. It had wholly failed. Where the Unions did not contribute, and where voluntary subscriptions could not be had, the teachers would actually lose two-thirds of their result fees. There were many cases of the grossest hardship. What had occurred in the North Union of Dublin? Since 1875, up to the present year, that Union had been contributing, and the teachers had received the benefit of the provision which the Government intended for them in 1875. They had been receiving the full amount of their result fees. This year the Union had ceased to be contributory, and these men were, at one sweep, deprived of two-thirds of their earnings. Upwards of £5,000 was lost to the teachers of that Union. There were 10,000 teachers in Ireland, and it was a monstrous thing that, the justice of their demands having been acknowledged in 1875, nothing had yet been done for them. They were now left in the same slough of despondency as before. If he rested his case on these facts alone, it ought to be recognized that they were suffering injustice. But there was the clearest breach of faith; there was no use in putting it in a milder way. The Government having assented to the Resolution, declaring that the subject should have their immediate attention, had done nothing, and not a word was said on the subject when the Irish Education Estimates were before the House. He had pointed out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that large sums voted for these result fees had, in consequence of the failure of the plan of 1875, found their way back into the Exchequer. This year, £20,000 out of the £120,000 had found its way back. Last year, something like £30,000 was returned; and similar sums were returned in the two preceding years. So that £100,000 intended for the teachers had not been paid to them, owing to the imperfection of the scheme. He had suggested to the Government that, as they had done nothing in accordance with the Resolution of the House, they should take £60,000 out of that £100,000, and apply that towards the payment of funds which ought to have been contributed by the Unions. The Government might do that this year, and bring in some scheme for finally settling the subject next year. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not deigned to reply to his communications. He granted that the question of pensions was a difficult one, and he did not intend now to touch upon that; but the question of salaries demanded immediate settlement. He would, therefore, move the Resolution which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, having, with the assent of Her Majesty's Government, on the 7th of May last passed a Resolution that the position of the Irish National Teachers called for the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government with a view to a satisfactory adjustment of their claims, this House is of opinion that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have given effect during the present Session to such Resolution, and to have made proposals to this House for securing with certainty to the Irish National School Teachers the full amount of the result fees to be earned by them in the current year,"—(Mr. Meldon,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. LOWTHER: The hon. and learned Gentleman speaks of a breach of faith on the part of the Government. I am sorry that language so strong should come from him; but I feel sure, when he hears what is the actual state of affairs, he will not wish to repeat the language. What took place was this. On the 7th May, the hon. and learned Gentleman, in a speech of great ability and moderation, as I myself took the liberty of observing at the time, brought forward the question of the position of the teachers of National Schools in Ireland. In reply, I called attention to the fact that the Government, in past Sessions, had not been unmindful of the interests of that class. They had introduced the Bill of 1875, to which he has referred, and had founded on it some regulations which I admitted did not lead to the results hoped for. I said, further, that the Government were not disposed to take exception to the Motion proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, provided some verbal Amendments, which I indicated, were acceded to. They were acceded to, and we accepted the Motion. That was a voluntary act on our part, and I do not find fault with the hon. and learned Gentleman for wishing us to carry out that engagement. But what was the nature of the engagement? Without referring to the details of the past debate, I must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that what I said was much to this effect—that this matter had been referred to the Treasury, with whom these questions rested, and that it had been found necessary to submit the figures bearing on the subject for an actuarial Report. We hope no long time will elapse before we get that Report. [MR. MELDON: That refers to the pensions.] The Resolution of the hon. and learned Member referred to the whole subject, and my reply referred to the subject as a whole. I never for a moment dreamt of dealing with the subject this Session, and that was shown by my indication of the probable appropriation of a portion of the surplus of the Irish Church funds. [MR. MELDON: My Resolution now deals solely with the question of salaries.] That may be, but the whole question of the National School Teachers is under the consideration of the House, and a considerable portion of the last discussion bore on the subject of pensions, and the appropriation of part of the surplus of the Irish Church funds was one of the suggestions entertained by the Government. It was found necessary that the persons who made the Report to which I have referred should have what is called an experience statement drawn up—a table based on averages. [MR. MELDON: That is with reference to pensions.] Exactly, and my idea is that the subject must be dealt with as a whole. As to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman, it is made in forgetfulness of the fact that the large sums of money to which he refers do not remain with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but are paid back into the Treasury according to law, and can only be given out on a fresh Vote of the House. It is impossible to deal at once with the subject in a comprehensive manner; but I hope, under these circumstances, that the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that we are studiously endeavouring to carry out our engagement to the House.

MR. WHITWELL was sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman turning aside from the question submitted to the House, and endeavouring to divert the attention of the House altogether from the subject of discussion. Pensions had not been referred to by the hon. and learned Member who introduced the subject to the House. He advocated an arrangement for increasing the salaries of teachers; but the subject of pensions for the Irish schoolmasters was a new one to him, and it struck him as extraordinary, if such a subject was to be coupled with an appropriation of Irish Church funds. What the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Meldon) contended was that it was acknowledged by the House that the Irish teachers did not receive as much salary as they ought to receive, and the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been directed to the adjustment of their claims. In the meantime, pending such adjustment, the poor teachers were receiving a mere nothing; it was all very well to wait for another year, but everyone knew that the present income of the teacher in Ireland was utterly insufficient. The mode in which the subject ought to have been dealt with was to have made the scheme compulsory on the Unions, and not merely voluntary. He was extremely sorry that another year must again pass over before the teachers could receive a single farthing in addition to their present miserable salaries.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY observed, that the right hon. Gentleman, in his reply to this matter, had dealt only with one branch of the subject brought forward—namely, that of pensions—ignoring the other part of the case put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kildare. It was an attempt to draw attention away from the real ground of complaint, notwithstanding that the hon. and learned Member had written two letters—one to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the other to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in respect of the matter. As the matter at present stood, the Resolution of the House remained nugatory, the Unions of Ireland refusing to contribute anything while the matter was left to their discretion. After an experience of two or three years of this refusal, the teachers were to be allowed to starve, while for four Sessions continual attempts were being made on the part of the Irish Members of every Party to obtain justice for them. The average salary of Irish teachers was only £51 a-year; and it was a great injustice to the men and women employed, and a greater injustice to the scholars, who were being huddled together in the schools under the control of those insufficiently-paid teachers, that they should be reduced to that condition. It was a mistaken system that would leave these men and women, on whom the intellectual life of the Irish nation depended, to be reduced to the half-starved condition in which they now were.

MR. O'CLERY remarked, that, no doubt, it would be said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and by some other Members of the Government, that unless Ireland contributed in some measure towards the support of the teachers, Irish Members had no right to come to the House and demand that further sums should be voted on their behalf. He thought it had been clearly shown to the House that the system of national education, as it at present existed, had been forced upon Ireland contrary to the wish of the Irish people, and of the Irish clergy and hierarchy. The people were compelled to receive this system of education, and it was hard to expect them to contribute to a system forced upon them against their will. According to law, the school boards were to be elected by the people; but when they found that only about 20 per cent of the population voted in respect of them, it was clear that the people did not agree with the system of education. If the Government would force upon the Irish nation a system of education, it was perfectly clear that if the teachers were underpaid, the Government could not refuse to make up their salaries. Therefore, there was no right to expect that these teachers, forced by the system of education upon the Irish people, were to be maintained by them. At the same time, it was absurd to expect that the National School Teachers of Ireland would continue year after year to discharge their duties faithfully, unless justice was done to them by the Government. Ten thousand teachers were now placed in the unworthy position of the Government receiving their services and insufficiently paying them. The Irish people had reason to hope that when the Intermediate Education Bill was passed, something would have been done to place the teachers in a position to exist, and to enable them properly to discharge their duties.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished, in the first place, to express his regret that the hon. and learned Member should have written a letter to him, which he did not acknowledge. He had some recollection of a letter coming to him, and of sending it to another Department, he himself not knowing what had been done in the matter. He was really very sorry that the letter had neither been acknowledged nor answered; but he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was from no want of courtesy on his part. He was under the impression that he spoke to his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on the matter; and it was also his impression that the Chief Secretary informed him that he had attended to it.

MR. MELDON said, that the answer he got was simply a mere acknowledgment of the receipt of his letter.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was extremely sorry that there had been anything like a want of courtesy; but he must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to remember that, in the multiplicity of matters to which he had to attend, he might occasionally forget something. But the much more material point was as to the justice of the complaint which the hon. and learned Gentleman made with regard to the conduct of the Government. He wished to remind him and the House of the position in which the Irish National School Teachers were, and of the different questions which, at different times, had been brought forward in respect of them. One point was with reference to their residences; another was as to the salaries of the teachers; and a third with regard to their pensions. As respected residences, he believed that that question had been practically settled; with regard to the salaries, the experiment was made two years ago by his right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), of dealing with the matter in such a way as would involve a certain amount of local contribution in aid of the Imperial grant. The Government were then of opinion, and still thought, that that was the proper proposal to make, and one in accordance with what was done in this country. Undoubtedly, to a certain extent, that proposal might be said to have failed. Why? Because there was a failure in the local contributions that were expected and hoped for. Contributions were made in some Unions; but in others, and the larger class of cases, no contributions were made, and the teachers were the sufferers. He did not know to what extent they went; but the proposals of the hon. and learned Gentleman now were in entire subversion of the scheme of the Government. It was proposed by the Government that if localities would contribute certain sums, the Imperial Exchequer would grant a like sum. Some Unions did contribute, and the State, accordingly, granted a like amount; and the hon. and learned Gentleman said, with regard to these cases, that he would leave them alone. But, undoubtedly, it would be hard upon the Unions that had contributed, if the other Unions were placed in a like situation, without any contribution. It would be placing those that did not contribute on a level with those that did. With regard to the third question—that of pensions—it was a point upon which it had always been admitted that something ought to be done, and a scheme in respect to the matter was before the Government, and would be carefully considered. It was in regard to pensions that the Government admitted something ought immediately to be done, and that immediate attention should be given. It was unnecessary that he should refer in detail to the debate that took place on the 7th of May. His right hon. Friend then stated very little. What he said as regarded salaries was that the first class of teachers were in receipt of sums amounting to £2 a-week; the second class to £1 10*s.* a-week, and the third to £1. He was not aware that in the speech of his right hon. Friend, or in any other speech on behalf of the Government, consideration was promised to the question of raising salaries; but undoubtedly, as regarded pensions, a promise was given, and the Government were prepared to fulfil that promise.

Mr. MELDON said, he understood that, in the debate of the 7th of May, a promise was made by the Government with regard to pensions. He did not think that they were receiving fair treatment by the mode in which the Government were now acting. As respected salaries, it was a most important matter, and the Government could raise them by bringing up the amount of public money given to Ireland to the same amount as that allowed Scotland. Between £60,000 and £70,000 was allowed to Scotland, and if the sum contributed to Ireland was raised to that amount, there would be an opportunity of paying the Irish National School Teachers proper salaries. He only asked that the same amount per head should be paid in Ireland as was paid in Scotland. In Scotland the Government spent about 3*s.* 2*d.* per head; whereas in Ireland the public money spent did not exceed 2*s.* 4*d.* per head. He considered that during the next six or eight months the Government ought to do something with regard to this matter. At all events, if the Government did not wish to contribute, they might allow the teachers to receive the result fees earned by them without the contribution of the Union.

At the present time, about £25,000 to £35,000 was returned into the Exchequer as surplus money, voted for national education in Ireland; that should be expended in increasing the salaries of the Irish National School Teachers—for it could not be expected that those people would remain contented to receive £50 a-year in Ireland, while the same class in England and Scotland obtained £105 a-year. If the suggestion he had made were attended to, it would do a great deal to put an end to the feeling of discontent which the action of the Government in regard to education in Ireland had excited.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES (IRELAND).—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY wished to call the attention of the Government to the condition of the stipendiary magistrates in Ireland. They were now appointed under the Act of Will. IV., which reduced the amount of their retiring salaries and placed them under a disadvantage as compared with their former position. The result was that while magistrates appointed before 1847 were allowed to retire on their full salaries, those who were appointed after that date had to retire at a much reduced pension; consequently, the Bench in Ireland was now stocked with men who were really not capable of discharging their duties. The men appointed before 1847 retired on completing the full period of 20 years' service, while the magistrates appointed after 1847, having to retire on a diminished pension, were averse to retiring at all. He did not mean to advocate that any larger pensions should be given than at present—that was a question for the Government—but he did submit that some steps should be taken to induce these gentlemen to retire from the duties of their office when they had reached the ordinary period when a man's labours should cease. At present, it was no uncommon thing for magistrates to be 71, 73, or 76 years of age. It was all very well to have men in the Superior Courts of very great age, because they were under the eye of public opinion; but these local magistrates were little kings in their own districts. They represented the law in rural localities, and it was most desirable that the law should be wisely and properly represented. Without suggesting that there should be any larger increase of the pensions, or that other stringent measures should be adopted, he would suggest to the Government the desirability of removing these magistrates at the proper time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that the matter, as he understood it, was rather difficult to decide by any legislation, and must be left to the action of public opinion, which up to that time had been found to be adequate. It had not been found necessary to lay down a hard-and-fast line as to the age at which a man should retire, and he did not think it was desirable to increase the compensation.

Clause 5 (Differences relating to a street or public road to be determined by stipendiary magistrates, county court judge, or sheriff).

MR. BRISTOWE moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 28, to leave out all the words after "difference" to the end of the clause, in order to insert the words "shall be decided by a judge of the High Court of Justice." He explained that the object of the Amendment was to enable any difference that might arise to be disposed of by the High Court of Justice, instead of by the Railway Commissioners. He did not think that the Commissioners, being a temporary body, should be the persons to whom references should ultimately be made. He had been informed, however, by the Postmaster General, that the matter had been under considerable discussion, and that, without giving any distinct opinion as to the merits of the Amendment, he could not accept it. Under these circumstances, he would not divide upon it, but would consent to have it negatived, having regard to the communication that had been made to him.

TRAMWAY ORDERS CONFIRMATION (No. 1) BILL—[BILL 299.]

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS AMENDMENTS.

Lords Amendments considered.

MR. MONK said, he should be glad to know what course the Government proposed to take with regard to these Amendments, and if they intended to agree to them. His constituents had learnt with great astonishment that, after the recommendations of the Select Committee on Tramways, with regard to steam power, and after a Bill had passed through that House for the purpose of authorizing its use, the House of Lords had struck out all the clauses with regard to mechanical power on tramways. The Committee had reported unanimously in favour of steam power; and, in addition to that, the principle was confirmed in a very full House by 216 votes to 119. The Bill had gone before the other House, and it had come back with all the steam power clauses struck out. It appeared, so far as he could learn, that that had been done at the instance of one person, without any evidence having been taken by the other House; and therefore he wished to ask the Government whether they intended to agree with these Amendments, or to confirm the views arrived at by the House in the case of the Private Bill to which he had referred, as well as by a Committee which sat for several weeks and took a great amount of evidence, and eventually issued a Report in favour of the use of steam power based upon evidence of the most satisfactory nature? This was a matter in which he knew his hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees had taken a great interest, and upon which he had appointed a very strong Committee, consisting principally of hon. Members who were usually Chairmen of Private Bill Committees. It was a very serious matter that after the enormous expense to which the promoters of these Bills had been put, at the last moment, by the mere will and whim of a single Member of Parliament, the power and right to use steam on tramways should be denied to England and Wales. He therefore hoped, in the first place, that the Government would not agree to those clauses being struck out; or, at all events, if they did so, they would assure him that the expenses to which the promoters of these tramways had been put in the matter should not be thrown away, but that legislation with regard to steam power should be proposed next year.

MR. J. G. TALBOT agreed with his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Monk), that it would be a great convenience to have the consideration of the matter taken to-morrow.

Consideration of Lords Amendments deferred till To-morrow.

TERRITORIAL WATERS JURISDICTION BILL—[Lords]—[BILL 137.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that he much regretted that the Bill had been so placed on the Paper that it was impossible to have a fair discussion of it. He had not expected that the Bill would be taken that night, nor did he believe that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General thought it was likely to come on. Three o'clock in the morning was a very improper time to enter upon the discussion of a Bill involving such momentous questions as this, violating, as it did, the rights of foreign nations, and, as he was told, being directly in opposition to the opinion of foreign countries. The Bill was perfectly unnecessary, for he considered that the law of England, as it at present stood, together with the good relations that now existed between nations, were quite sufficient to accomplish the purpose aimed at by the measure. It reversed the solemn decision of the Judges in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in the case of the Franconia, and, therefore, it was a matter of very great importance. The effect of the Bill, as it now stood, would be to give a jurisdiction to the English Courts over all foreign ships within three miles of the shore of England, whether they were ships of war or merchant ships. The principle of the law of England was that the jurisdiction of the Admiralty commenced at low water mark, and that only the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction there; but by Statute, Judges of Assize had jurisdiction in the space between high and low water mark — that was to say, there was a jurisdiction to that extent in the Common Law Courts. Thus, at high water, the Admiralty had jurisdiction over the fore shore; but at low water, the ordinary Courts exercised authority up to the limit of the strand left bare by the sea. In running-down cases, the matters were dealt with by virtue of the good relations which existed between various nations. In the case of the Franconia, the man who was charged with the running down was tried in his own country for the offence, and it was thereby clear that there was no need for this legislation. He ventured to say that if any foreign ship did any injury on the high seas, a remedy would be afforded to this country by the nation to which the captain of the vessel belonged; and, therefore, no change of the law was necessary to meet this case. No doubt, the ordinary rule of International Law was that every country had jurisdiction within three miles of its own shore. That, he admitted, was the principle laid down by the authorities on International Law, who held that a jurisdiction was exercisable by any particular State within a certain distance of its own shores, wherever the safety of such State rendered it necessary. Thus, any country had a right to provide for its own safety by exercising a certain jurisdiction over the sea near its own shores, and over the ships within that limit, in such particulars as were necessary for her safety, and came within the range of International Law. But it was unnecessary for the safety of any country that its Courts should have jurisdiction over the sea within three miles of the shore in ordinary criminal cases. He did think, therefore, that this Bill was founded on a misapprehension of the rule about the three miles' distance—that the Bill was unnecessary, and that it was calculated to bring this country, as it would bring it, into difficulties with foreign nations. It was true that there was a clause in the Bill providing that no proceedings should be taken against persons other than Her Majesty's subjects without the permission of the Secretary of State; but that clause showed the weakness of the measure. It was an admission that the Bill was contrary to the rights of other nations. Therefore, to provide that no proceedings should be taken against foreigners without the previous permission of the Secretary of State was not sufficient, for a Public Bill should be so framed as not to violate the rights of foreign countries; it should only be framed within the limits which International Law had laid down as the jurisdiction of a country. It was not right to go beyond that, and attempt to give jurisdiction to the ordinary Courts in cases where it was not required for the safety of the country, and where International Law was against the exercise of such jurisdiction. By so extending the jurisdiction to Criminal Courts, the principles of International Law were really violated. Last Session, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) brought in a Bill like the present, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General then very properly said that such a Bill ought not to be introduced without previous communication with foreign countries—and in the earlier part of the evening the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told him that no such communication had taken place — and obtaining their consent to its passing. In his opinion, the wisest course for Her Majesty's Government to take would be to withdraw this Bill and re-consider the Motion; and, if necessary, to introduce another Bill next Session, after communications with some of the principal foreign nations. He would not say more at that early hour; but would reserve any further observations to the third reading. He was afraid, if the Bill passed in its present form, it would be found to give rise to considerable difficulties with foreign countries.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Amendment of the law as to the jurisdiction of the Admiral).

Sir GEORGE BOWYER said, that its effect would be to include a ship of war as well as a merchant vessel. By the law of nations, every ship of war was part of the territory of the country to which it belonged. Supposing an offence were committed on board a ship of war, and steps were taken to punish the criminal according to the law laid down by this Bill, it would be, in effect, a violation of International Law. It was no answer to say that the Secretary of State might not possibly allow such steps to be taken, nor was it any answer to the objection to the clause on the ground that it was contrary to the principles of International Law to say that an offence committed on board a ship of war belonging to a foreign country would not be cognizable by the English Courts, for the Bill already made it so. The effect of the clause, therefore, was to violate the principles of International Law, and it was desirable that at some future stage of the Bill this should be remedied. That could be done by making the only offences cognizable by the English Courts such as were committed on board any foreign ship, or by the crew of any foreign ship not being a ship of war. Such a Proviso would render the clause less objectionable, and he, therefore, begged to move that as an Amendment to it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Hardinge Giffard) observed, that the Amendment was unnecessary, and might imperil the passing of the Bill. The Bill did not affect to deal with any principle of International Law, and he might observe that such authorities as the Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne, and Lord Hatherley agreed in the opinion that a foreign ship of war was not included by the definition given in the clause.

Sir GEORGE BOWYER was not aware that the point had yet been raised; but he considered it unquestionable that the words "foreign ship" included a ship of war. By the Interpretation Clause, it was provided that "foreign ship" should mean any ship that was not a British ship. It was all very well to say that International Law would operate to prevent any breach of its own rules; but there would be an Act of Parliament expressly to override it. The Judges would have the words of the Act of Parliament before them, and not the rules of International Law; and supposing that there were words in the Act of Parliament which, in their opinion, included foreign ships of war, they would have to give effect to them. He maintained that a Judge would have to decide on the words in the English Act of Parliament, and would have no power to say that the rules of International Law overruled an Act of Parliament.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Hardinge Giffard) remarked, that the same observation would apply to every Act of Parliament. Surely the hon. and learned Member could not consider such a position tenable.

Sir GEORGE BOWYER said, that the case cited by the Solicitor General was not pari materia. Clearly, if the term "French ship" were used, it would mean every French vessel, whether a ship of war or not. Even with regard to a merchant ship, there was a principle of law that it was ex-territorial, though in a minor degree to a ship of war. Let them take another case. If an Act of Parliament prescribed certain regulations with regard to all foreign houses in this country, that would apply as well to the houses of Ambassadors as to others. The Judges, in such a case, would not be at liberty to hold that the rules of International Law prevailed, and exempted the houses of Ambassadors from the operation of the Act of Parliament.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 197.)

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD O'HAGAN: My Lords, in asking your Lordships to read this Bill a second time, I shall not find it necessary to occupy your attention beyond a very short time in discussing the reasons for that Motion. The Bill has been, as your Lordships are all aware, for a long period indeed before the country. It has been debated night after night, week after week, and month after month, in the House of Commons, usque ad nauseam. It has been, in all aspects of the question which it raises, discussed by most of the public journals in this country on the one side and on the other. The result is that I should be very much unwarranted in supposing that there is a single Peer of those whom I now address who is not tolerably well acquainted with the reasons which can be given both for or against the Bill. The Bill comes before your Lordships under very remarkable circumstances. It is a measure which, though it has been modified in its progress, has been substantially more than one Session in the House of Commons. It has been encountered, during the last Session and in the present, by an opposition as ingenious and as obstinate as was ever offered to any measure presented to the House of Commons; and it has weathered that opposition by the aid of sweeping majorities on every occasion when any question has been raised. It comes before your Lordships, further, with the approval of the Government, who considered the measure very carefully and very anxiously, and from time to time proposed modifications, all of which were accepted. Finally, it comes before this House supported by a body of Irish opinion which, having regard to its weight and character, has never before been brought to bear, I believe, in support of any measure. I do not mean to say that this is a very great measure. It is, in fact, very small in extent. It is a Bill of very few clauses, its principle is exceedingly simple, and its object is very easily understood. It is not a Bill which will create a social revolution, or vitally change the manners of the country; but it is a Bill aiming at a good object, and it seeks, so far as can be done by such machinery as it contains, to destroy a vice which is the greatest curse of Ireland, and which is at the root of the misery and crime of that country. It is therefore, I believe, my Lords, that it has received, I will not say from all, but from the great mass of the intelligent Irishmen, most cordial support, and that a most anxious desire has been exhibited by the people, or most of the people, of all classes in Ireland, to have this Bill carried, and carried, if possible, in its integrity, or at least as it now stands modified by the action of the Government. I do not think it necessary to go much into detail as to the reasons for the measure, because I do not consider it desirable that I should tell a twice-told tale, which would be very tedious to your Lordships. I will not repeat trite and stale arguments which are familiar to most of those I am addressing; but I may say that there seem to have been two main objections presented by the opponents of the Bill, and by those chiefly who are interested in the liquor traffic; though I do not mean to say there are not others who have taken exception to the Bill on grounds which I do not entirely disapprove. But one of the principal cries that we have heard in the House of Commons and elsewhere is that it is a new Coercion Bill for Ireland; and we have had the changes rung on that expression till people have almost persuaded themselves into the belief that it was not a mere perversion of the English language, but that there was some foundation for it. It is a Coercion Bill, it is true; but only in the sense in which all laws are coercive. A law which interferes with the free action of any individual, for any purpose whatever, may be said to be a Coercion Bill; and if this is said to be a Coercion Bill, it is a Bill for a good and beneficent purpose—it is a Bill aimed to put an end to the greatest and most blighting vice of the country to which I belong. It is a Bill which is not at all out of the ordinary course of legislation; because, as your Lordships are fully aware, those who are pursuing the liquor traffic have not been left by the law of the land the same freedom of action that has been accorded to other traders, and for the plainest of reasons—that the liquor traffic, badly pursued, has results most injurious to the morals and good order of society. Over and over again restrictions have been imposed upon this particular trade, and by the Bill now before your Lordships, nothing is done but to extend to the whole of the Sunday the restrictive legislation which now affects a very great portion of the Sunday. The hours of closing which have been long prescribed by law no one objects to now, though, except in the matter of degree, the law which fixes them is as much a Coercion Act as this Bill is. These restrictions were designed to save the Sunday as much as possible from desecration, to prevent the day from being spent in idleness, immorality, and sometimes in the destruction of life, instead of being devoted to the service of God, and to the cultivation of good and kindly feelings. It is said, again, that all this sumptuary legislation is a mistake, and that it is useless to attempt to make people moral by Act of Parliament. I entirely concur that morality is only to be secured by training the heart and the understanding—but the process may be assisted by legislation. In a case of this sort, the law is a sort of external conscience to a man, warning him what is evil and showing him what is good; and therefore, though we cannot make people moral by law, we can assist them to become moral by removing temptations from them, and putting them in such a condition that good and virtuous habits may be cultivated more easily and better than they were before. Therefore, so far as these arguments are concerned, it appears to me that the case against the Bill fails altogether. But if there were any ground for alleging that this is an interference with the liberties of the people, I may remind the House that in Ireland this experiment—and it is nothing but an experiment, limited in its operation and duration in a very careful way—is not without precedent, though this precedent has not taken the form of legislative enactment. In some dioceses the closing of public-houses on Sunday, though not enforced by law, has been voluntarily submitted to for a very considerable time by the vendors as well as by the consumers of spirituous liquors. In those dioceses the Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church—men of the greatest benevolence but great force of will—saw that Sunday drinking was most injurious to the morals and to the habits of their people. Over and over again they saw faction fights occurring on the Sunday, over and over again they saw in the neighbourhood of their churches people congregated together consuming intoxicating drinks, and in the end becoming the victims of secret conspirators. There was no combined action; but each Bishop acted for himself, and in two dioceses a Sunday closing law, not appealing at all to the civil authority, was put in operation. A great body of the publicans themselves were anxious to be permitted to close their houses, and when they found that they would not be placed at a disadvantage by others remaining open, but that all would close together, they were glad of the change. In those particular dioceses, the closing of the public-houses showed the advantage to the people in promoting order, peace, and domestic happiness, and the greater security of the district generally. Should this Bill produce as great moral and social effects on the country as have been produced by the voluntary action of the people in these districts, it will be a most happy thing for Ireland. I should not do justice to the cause I am advocating if I did not ask your Lordships' careful attention to the National Memorial which was presented last year on this subject. There had, indeed, in the antecedent year, been a similar Memorial signed by upwards of 10,000 persons, and the prayer was simply this. After referring to the past history of the movement, and the difficulty felt by private Members in dealing with it, and stating that the greatest interest was felt by all classes in the speedy settlement of the question, the memorialists begged to express an earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government would respond to the demands which had been made by three-fourths of the Irish Members of Parliament, that Parliament would pass a measure which would, more than any other, tend to give peace to Ireland. The importance of that Memorial is to be judged of not alone by the number of persons who signed it, but by the weight and importance attached to the names of the signatories; and on examining them your Lordships will find that it is signed by nearly all, if not all, the Roman Catholic Bishops, by every one of the Bishops of the late Established Church of Ireland; by the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, by a large number of Presbyterian ministers, and ministers of other Dissenting congregations; by the great majority of the Magistrates, Town Councillors, and Guardians of the Poor in Ireland, and by thousands of gentlemen, bankers, merchants, and tradesmen. It was, therefore, taken as an appeal from the nation which it is impossible to disregard. It is only natural to entertain a Memorial so presented, and I think that your Lordships will be disposed to entertain the same opinion as I do, and that they will be inclined to agree with me that there has been, for the first time, a combination of Irishmen of all shades of religious and political opinion in complete agreement upon this one point, and joining in a demand that Parliament should take steps to pass a measure, the effect of which will be to improve the morals, and consequently the happiness, of the people of that country. Such being the case, I think that it will take very little persuasion to induce your Lordships to pass this measure as a good one. Still less proper will it be to reject it when we are aware of the fact that the Irish Members generally have rallied round the measure, which is supported not only by the clergy and laity of Ireland but by the whole Press of the country. If ever there was a Bill which deserves to be called a national one, it is this. I think that I have said enough to induce your Lordships to give it a second reading; but if there be any lingering doubt of the propriety of such a course, it will vanish when I tell your Lordships that the measure is tentative in its character and temporary in its operation. All the Amendments proposed by the Government have been accepted by the promoters of the Bill, and it is limited in point of time, expiring in 1882, unless Parliament should see fit to continue it. I entertain very little doubt that if its effect is such as I believe it will be, there will be no difficulty in getting it continued at the end of that period. Whether that is so or not, I trust that your Lordships will find no difficulty in passing it. In conclusion, I can but express a hope that the same Parliament now approaching its close which has passed the excellent measure for the promotion of Intermediate Education in Ireland— a measure for which the present Administration deserves the confidence of the people at large—will also pass this measure, which is one of capital importance, and will be fraught with countless blessings to the community.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2ª."—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I do not intend to give any opposition to the proposal of the noble and learned Lord. The measure is one which, as the noble and learned Lord has just stated, has occupied the attention of the other House of Parliament for a considerable period during last Session, and for a still greater period during the present Session. All the arguments which could be adduced to induce Members to vote for or against the measure have been put forward in that House in the most forcible manner it is possible they could be done. The noble and learned Lord is perfectly correct in stating that Her Majesty's Government had to consider—during the passing of the Bill through the other House of Parliament—whether it would be for the public benefit of the people of Ireland that some such measure as this should be passed, and thinking that it was, and having considered the Bill, they proposed certain Amendments which were accepted by those who had charge of the Bill; and Her Majesty's Government now views the Bill as amended with favour, and will offer no opposition whatever to the second reading.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I cannot allow this Bill to be read a second time without expressing the great satisfaction with which I have watched its progress in the other House of Parliament. It is, as the noble and learned Lord remarked, a tentative measure, and, indeed, it might have been drawn more stringently without any injury to it. It will enable the principle to be tried, and I hope it will be so successful in its operation, and set so good an example, that it will be followed at no distant date by a Bill which may be carried with considerable unanimity for the rest of the United Kingdom.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

MINES REGULATION ACT, 1872—DINAS COLLIERIES.—QUESTION.

MR. BURT (for Mr. MACDONALD) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the report of the trial of the manager of the Dinas Collieries for a breach of the Mines Regulation Act, reported in the "Western Mail" of the 8th instant; if it be true that the manager took the sub-inspector (Mr. Galloway) into a place where there was a large body of gas, and that he found two men working among that gas; if he had to order the lights to be put out, and the men to be removed from the place; and, whether, if the above statement is well founded, the certificate of the manager will be removed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the proceedings were not yet over. Persons engaged in the mine had to appear again before the magistrates, he believed, on Monday next, if not before. Until the legal proceedings were over, it would not be right for him to say more upon the subject.

INDIA — DECCAN RIOTS COMMISSION. QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Report of the Deccan Riots Commission will be distributed; if he would state to what area of country or population that Report relates; and, whether the Government are aware of any steps being taken in India to remedy the steps complained of?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Report of the Deccan Riots Commission, with the Minutes appended, is very long; but it is in the printer's hands, and will, I hope, be distributed in a fortnight. The Report relates only to the districts of Poona and Ahmednuggur, containing an area of 12,000 square miles, and a population of 1,680,000. It would be a mistake to assume from this Report that a similar state of things had been shown to exist in other parts of India. Legislation based on this Report has been proposed by the Government of Bombay, and has been pressed upon the attention of the Viceroy by the Secretary of State. We have lately heard, but without any details, that the Government of India has introduced a Bill which they hope will remedy some of the very grave evils which have been shown to exist.

RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, since the decision of the 6th July 1874 in the Court of Exchequer on the Railway Passenger Duty, the Board of Inland Revenue has framed any rules for regulating the exemptions; and, if so, whether he will have any objection to lay them upon the Table of the House, and cause them to be printed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, Sir; it has not been thought necessary to frame any rules. There is only one exemption under the Act of Parliament.

IRELAND — A DEPARTMENTAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (for Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that a Commission has been appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland composed of five Clerks of the Crown and Peace and Mr. Herbert Murray; and, whether the Commission is now sitting in the Castle at Dublin; if so, what is the nature and object of the inquiry entrusted to the Commission?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I understand that a Departmental Inquiry is going on, but to what extent I am not aware. It is composed, I believe, as the hon. Gentleman's Question indicates. I only heard of the Question last night for the first time, and have not been able to obtain full details; but I believe the statement the hon. Gentleman has made is more or less correct.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT (1875)—SEARCHES FOR ARMS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (for Major NOLAN) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If Mr. Harris, of Ballinasloe, whose house was searched for arms on the 14th June, has written to the Inspector General of Constabulary in Ireland, stating that the constables who searched his house had exceeded their instructions as described by the Chief Secretary in the House of Commons, demanding an investigation into the actual circumstances which had occurred; and, if such an investigation has been granted or would be granted?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I understand that Mr. Harris has entered into a further correspondence with the authorities on this subject. As I have stated on several previous occasions, the action of the Constabulary was perfectly legal. They acted under warrants obtained in the proper manner, and no good object would be served to Mr. Harris, or anyone else, by re-opening the subject. It is, I believe, not intended to comply with the request for an investigation.

THE IRISH BOARD OF WORKS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (for Major NOLAN) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to act upon the recommendations contained in the Report of the Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of the Board of Works this Session; if not, if they would issue instructions to the Board of Works not to collect any further half-yearly instalments which may become due by the Galway Mills until it is ascertained what amount of relief they are entitled to?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: As I have once before stated, I can hardly, without more fully considering the Report than I have been able to do, in consequence of the pressure of Parliamentary Business, state what action the Government would take upon this Report. The Government will at the earliest day possible take that Report into careful consideration. It would not be right, however, to prejudge the case by making any order with regard to the Galway Mills, which is only one of several cases referred to.

POST OFFICE—WEST INDIAN MAIL CONTRACT.—QUESTION.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that a contract has been made for the conveyance of the West Indian Mails; and, if so, when the Papers relating to it will be produced?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that the contract for the conveyance of the West India Mails was signed yesterday. It was for the conveyance of the whole of the mails by one system. He had hoped to be able to lay the contract on the Table this year, and ask the House to affirm the action of the Government in the matter. But as he had promised the House that all the Papers should be produced together, he feared that time would hardly suffice for their being printed soon enough to admit of any discussion taking place upon them; and he therefore feared the contract would have to remain for affirmation till the beginning of next Session. It had been thought wise to adhere to the old system of accepting the tender of one Company for the conveyance of the whole of the mails.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA — EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS — THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it was not his intention to presume upon their indulgence after his short experience by affecting to speak with authority upon any of the numerous and intricate subjects connected with the administration of India. All that he should endeavour to do was to put as clearly as he could before the House the present actual condition of Indian finance. Any lengthened statement on his part was unnecessary, inasmuch as the financial arrangements of the year, as far as they were already known, had been the subject of discussion in the House on two occasions during the present Session, and once also in "another place." But, as the present aspect of the matter was of special importance, and so constituted, it might be a new departure in the history of Indian finance, he should hardly be doing justice to the Government of India if he did not, however shortly, give a comprehensive account. On the present occasion, the comparison that was usually made between the different years under consideration by the House was rendered more than usually difficult by changes in the form of accounts. At the same time, he believed that the changes were so substantially advantageous that they would in the end gain general acceptance. Anybody who chose to look into the matter for himself would find that the general result of those changes was to add something like £4,500,000 to both sides of the account. The statement of the three years which he should have to present to the House would show the accounts of the first year as they had actually turned out, of the second year as they were almost certain to turn out, and of the third year as they were estimated in the Budget. The accounts for 1876-7 showed a Revenue of £55,995,785, and an Expenditure of £58,178,563, leaving a deficit of £2,182,778. Making allowance for the change in the form of accounts to which he had referred, and independently of the charge entailed on the Government by the Famine, those results corresponded very satisfactorily with the Budget Estimate of two years before, the two principal variations being caused by the growth of the receipts on the guaranteed railways, and by the Famine expenditure. If the estimated cost of the Famine in Southern India during the financial year were deducted, the result was that the surplus estimated for the year now under review had been exceeded by more than £1,000,000 sterling. Coming now to the regular Estimate for 1877-8, the Revenue was placed at £58,635,472, and the Expenditure at £62,018,853, leaving a deficit of £3,383,381. The most noticeable feature of the year was the enormous increase in the receipts of the guaranteed railways, which amounted to no less a sum than £1,693,800. The Revenue from salt exceeded the Budget Estimate by the sum of £223,000—a fact which was especially worthy of notice, inasmuch as it was considered that it was only in a slight degree due to the alterations in the rate of duty made in December last. The House would hear with pleasure of an item of receipt of £50,000 for cinchona bark, which was a much larger sum than had been anticipated. Under the head of the Mint there was an increase of £274,000, which was due to the large coinage operations necessitated by the great influx of silver. The only material decrease was a falling-off of £837,800 in Land Revenue, owing to the Famine. That, again, had been the great disturbing element which almost prevented any useful comparison with ordinary years. His noble Friend estimated the direct charge for Famine expenditure during the year 1877-8 at £1,425,000. That amount had been very largely exceeded; but if, as in the former year, they excluded the Famine charges, they would find that the financial result of the year was, on the whole, more favourable than his noble Friend anticipated by the sum of £1,250,000, which was more than accounted for by the receipts of the guaranteed railways. When the Estimates for that year were framed, it was anticipated that all cause for anxiety on account of the Famine might pass away with the arrival of the monsoon. That hope was destined to be disappointed. The late coming of the rains caused a continuance of distress in Madras and Mysore long after the period at which they hoped it would terminate, and the drought which prevailed in other parts of India produced a great strain on the finances. But the strain on the finances caused by Famine must be more a matter of estimate than anything else; because it depended not only on the amount of direct Famine relief, and on the loss on the Land Revenue, the Customs, and the Excise, but also on the indirect expenditure, caused by the necessity of pushing on public works, of increasing the rolling-stock upon railways, of providing loans to Native States, and other items. Estimated upon that basis, and in the expectation, he was happy to say that the Famine expenditure of the present year would be recouped by the arrears of Land Revenue, which it was hoped to receive, they arrived at a total loss due to the recent Famine, directly and indirectly, of £9,750,000, of which £6,500,000 occurred during the last financial year. When they came to estimate the results of that expenditure, it was more difficult to give the House exact information. But many hon. Members had desired to arrive, if possible, at some idea of the degree in which life had been sacrificed. That feeling had been shared by his noble Friend, and by the Government of India also, and they had accordingly caused a partial Census to be taken of the distressed districts in Southern India. The Returns made under that Census were now on the Table of the House, and hon. Gentlemen would observe that the Government of India, while expressing their opinion that there had been a deplorable diminution of the population, thought the results were not sufficient to enable them to form any correct estimate of the mortality. In that opinion his noble Friend entirely concurred; but as the estimates on that subject which had reached this country were of an exaggerated nature, and as it was represented by the Correspondent of The Times that the mortality exceeded 6,000,000, and as other influential persons had adopted the same view, the Government had felt it to be desirable that, however imperfect the Returns might be, they should endeavour to give some estimate of the mortality arising from Famine. The result, as far as they could gather it from the figures sent to them, was as follows:—They estimated the mortality in the Bombay Presidency at 260,000 lives; in Madras at 690,000, and at Mysore at 400,000—making a total of 1,350,000 lives. No words of his could adequately express the deplorable nature of that result. At the same time, it was, as the House would see, much more favourable than some of the estimates which had been formed. All he could say was that he was afraid it was almost hopeless in India in every case to prevent mortality; but they recognized, to the fullest extent, the gallant efforts made by all the officers in India, of all ranks, to avert or mitigate the great calamity which had befallen that country. He trusted that the Famine would not fail to leave useful lessons behind it. The House would have heard with satisfaction of the appointment of a Famine Commission, not only to investigate the principles on which Famine relief had hitherto been administered, but also to endeavour to ascertain how far it might be possible to prevent the recurrence of future disasters, or to put the population in a better condition for enduring them. From the labours of that Commission, aided as it would be by the valuable and independent assistance of Mr. Caird, they hoped for very excellent results. But the second lesson to be derived from the recent Famine was the necessity of recognizing, without delay, the fact that the periodical recurrence of Famine in India ought to enter into their calculations upon making financial provision for their ordinary needs from year to year. After the Bengal Famine of 1874, Lord Northbrook declared that in India Famines could no longer be looked upon as wholly abnormal or exceptional phenomena, and that the grave obligations incurred in respect to Famine must be recognized, met, and provided for, among the ordinary charges of the year. That opinion had been approved and reaffirmed by successive Secretaries of State, but was for the first time put into practical operation by the Government of Lord Lytton. Choosing a moment when public opinion was sufficiently excited in regard to endeavours for mitigating the calamities of Famine to strengthen their hands, they had not shrunk even from the unpopularity of imposing new taxation to accomplish that object. It had been estimated by Sir John Strachey, that in the course of every 10 years they had to expend £15,000,000 on Famine relief. Get a real surplus, he said, of £1,500,000, and apply that to the reduction of Debt, and the result would be that at the end of 10 years they would have met all their expenditure on Famines without any addition to the Debt. Hardly any part of that £1,500,000 could be met out of existing sources of taxation. Before the recent Famine, it was estimated that the state of Indian finance showed pretty nearly an equilibrium. In fact, the only source whatever from which they could expect material assistance was from the extension of the system of decentralization which was introduced by Lord Mayo, and which was expected to yield, in the year before them, £400,000 in addition to what was previously obtained. That policy had been pursued with great energy in the past year, and although it was too soon to form a strong opinion as to the results it would achieve, especially as the provincial finances had been disturbed by Famine, still all the Reports received by the Government of India testified to the satisfactory nature of the change which had been made. In Bengal, where that system had got into full working order, the Lieutenant Governor said that its operation had induced a careful scrutiny into all branches of the Public Expenditure, had led to improvements in different branches of the Revenue, and had prevented that friction which might otherwise have existed between the local and Imperial Governments. There remained, then, as the House would see, £1,100,000 to be provided for Famine insurance. Could any part of that sum be met by the diminution of Expenditure? They had had Petitions sent from Calcutta to that House and to the other House of Parliament, urging the adoption of that course; and in presenting a Petition to the House of Lords, Lord Northbrook—whose high authority must be admitted—made some remarks on the subject. But the only practical suggestion which Lord Northbrook made as to the actual diminution of Expenditure in India was—first, that they should keep a very careful eye on the Expenditure for Public Works—an observation in which everybody would agree; and, secondly, that the Home Charges for the Army might with benefit be re-adjusted to the advantage of India. Now, on that he might himself have a little more to say when they came to discuss the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney. But what he wanted to invite the attention of the House to was this—that after making those suggestions, Lord Northbrook went on to say—

> "Although he thought something might be done in the way of reduction of expenditure, and he was satisfied that the Government of India were not neglectful of any opportunity that might occur for effecting reductions, he did not think it very likely that the cost of the government of India could be very considerably diminished. Whatever savings might be made in one direction would be met by the increasing demands for improvements of different kinds throughout India."

Then the noble Lord added, that although they could not rely on any substantial diminution of Expenditure, they might possibly avert the necessity of imposing fresh taxation; because the Government of India had been for years in the habit of under-estimating its Income. During the last five or six years, with one exception, there had been a sufficient surplus; and, on the whole, the expenditure on the Famines had been met by the ordinary Revenues of the country. But the noble Lord, in his endeavour to show that a sufficient Famine fund had been provided, had forgotten that in his Estimate he had charged some unremunerative public works—such as the military railways—to capital, while it had been a special point in a proper system of finance to charge them, not as capital, but as revenue. Sir John Strachey, summing up his remarks on the proposals of the noble Lord, had said—

> "The figures which I have given show that during the past seven years we should have just managed, after meeting all charges for unremunerative public works, to bring our Expenditure within our Income, if there had been no income tax and no Famine; but we cannot omit Famine from our calculations, and we have now no income tax. It therefore follows, judging by the experience of these seven years, that our ordinary Revenues are just sufficient to meet all ordinary charges, excepting those for the relief of Famine, for which we may consider that no provision is now made."

The Government of India, then, had every reason for saying that they could not rely upon an over-estimate of Income, and that if they were to provide for Famine they would have to impose additional taxation. The House was aware of what that consisted. There was the licence tax, and the new taxation upon the land. In Bengal and Northern India the incidence of the new taxation upon trades and agriculturists was about equal; but Madras and Bombay, having suffered from famine very severely, and having had to submit, also, to an increase of the salt tax, were exempt altogether from the land tax. The objection originally urged against the new licence tax would be very considerably lessened by the further explanations received as to the mode in which it was to be enforced. It had been said that it was a tax upon the very poor; but that turned out not to be the case, because it was not to be imposed upon any person earning a net income of less than 100 rupees a-year; and Government had the power of extending the limit of exemption upwards, but not downwards. There were many men in receipt of that income who would escape the tax; and, moreover, anybody who could prove that the amount of the tax was more than 2 per cent of his net annual earnings, might ask either for a reduction or for total exemption. So much for the inferior limit of the tax. As regards its superior limit, there was much more to be said. It had been urged that the tax did not fall upon those who could best afford to pay it, and this was no doubt, to some extent, true. The Government of India had endeavoured partly to meet this objection, and though the maximum fee in Bombay remained at 200 rupees, it was fixed for all Northern India at 500 rupees, and for Madras at 800 rupees. Whether any further steps should be taken to remove an objection to the tax which had been very widely entertained was a matter well deserving the attention of the Government of India. Then, as regarded the tax on land, to which much objection had been taken, it seemed to him that the best answer was that it would have been impossible, and certainly most unjust, to endeavour to raise the amount required without calling for contributions from the agricultural classes. The only result would have been that they would have had to tax them in another form. But when they remembered that Madras and Bombay were excluded wholly from that tax, and the North-Western Provinces partially, because of the recent suffering from drought, they would see that there was nothing in the condition of those classes to justify the statement that they ought to bear no part of the Famine taxation. He had thus endeavoured to dispose of the special taxation imposed for purposes of famine insurance before passing on to describe the other changes which formed part of the financial proposals of the year. The first of these dealt with, perhaps, the greatest object of Indian financiers in modern times—namely, the abolition of the Inland Customs line, and with it of the transit duties upon sugar. It had been so often described that he was almost ashamed to ask the House to bear in mind what it was desired to abolish. In order to prevent the ingress into our territories of salt taxed at lower rates, a line had been maintained of many hundreds of miles in length—at one time 2,400—consisting principally of a hedge of thorny trees and bushes, supplemented by stone walls and ditches, which could not be passed by anyone without examination. This line was kept up at an enormous expense, and guarded by a force of 8,000 men. In the year 1872, the Government of India had called for the opinions of local officers as to the effect of the existing system of taxation upon the people. In reply to that Circular, the officers of the Central Provinces had pointed out that the Customs line to the North and South of these Provinces was one of the measures connected with taxation of which the people most complained; and from Bengal the Lieutenant Governor — now the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy—had written that throughout his tour it had seemed to him that the Customs line had been felt by the people as a greater grievance than all other grievances put together. No one could travel through those districts without being liable to constant search by Custom House officers. Everywhere it was stated that the annoyance to travellers was great, for they were always liable to be stopped and overhauled, and the possession or suspicion of the possession of salt carried with it difficulty and vexation. Besides, though this would apply only to travellers in one direction, the necessity of collecting inland sugar duties caused almost equal annoyance to travellers in the other direction, and the temptation offered to smuggling was so great that the people in some parts were described as becoming demoralized by it. That line had therefore been condemned by successive Governments, and by most of those who had studied the financial affairs of India. The mode in which salt was supplied varied very greatly in different parts of India. Bengal and Assam derived almost their whole supply from Cheshire; Madras and Bombay and a part of the Central Provinces obtained salt made from the sea; and the Punjab had an abundant supply of rock salt. But 47,000,000 of people dwelling in the North-Western Provinces, Oude, and in the Central Provinces depended almost entirely for their salt upon the Native States of Rajpootana and that district. The rate of duty itself, and the mode of levying it, presented almost as much variation. The steps, therefore, necessary for the abolition of the line were—first, to extend railways into the salt-producing districts, and to enter into arrangements with the Native States of those districts, so that all salt might be taxed at the place of production; secondly, to remove the inequalities in the rate of duty in different parts of the country. A great advance in this direction had been made by the extension of railways into Rajpootana; and, during the Administration of Lord Mayo, the lease of the Sambhar Salt Lake had enabled a great reduction to be made in the price of salt. In 1874, the first step towards its actual abolition had been taken, and the Southern Customs line, extending over 800 miles of country, had been dispensed with—the effect of which had been to reduce the price of salt in the Central Provinces and in Orissa, with practically no financial loss at all. In the meantime, the negotiations with the States of Rajpootana had been continued, and had reached such a point that in December last the Government was of opinion that some progress might also be made in the second of the necessary conditions—the equalization of the rates of duty. This was accomplished by a decrease in the rate of duty in Northern India and an increase in Madras and Bombay. This increase, accompanied though it had been by relief from other taxation, and necessary though it was if equalization was to be attained, had been sharply criticized in the House. He did not desire to renew the controversy. The increase which had been made did not amount to more than a tax of 2*d.* a-year upon each consumer, and while the incidence of the tax at the rate of 2 rupees 8 annas did not exceed ¾*d.* per lb., the actual cost of salt was gradually being lessened by the spread of the railway system and the diminished cost of transit. But very recently—within the last few weeks—we had learnt that the negotiations with the Native States had come to a satisfactory termination, and the Government of India had come to the conclusion that the result of those Treaties enabled them at once to take steps for carrying out their long-cherished object of abolishing the Customs line. Accordingly, from the 1st of this month, the salt duty in Northern India had been reduced to 2 rupees 8 annas per maund, except in Bengal, where it would be fixed at 2 rupees 14 annas. The result was that with the exception just mentioned, one uniform rate prevailed throughout India. The accomplishment of this object justified, to the fullest extent, the contention of the Indian Government, which was much criticized at the time — that the recent increase in Madras and Bombay was really imposed for financial reform, and not from financial necessities. The effect upon the Revenue caused by this reduction of the duty was expected to be a loss of about the same amount as was gained by the increase in Southern India. The House would bear in mind, when he came to state the Budget Estimates for the present year, that the loss of Revenue just announced—amounting, in the present year, to £150,000, and in future years to something under £300,000—had not been included. The Government had at present received only the telegraphic announcement of the reduction; and he was, therefore, not yet in a position to make any detailed statement to the House as to the mode in which it was proposed to carry it out. He might, however, at once answer one criticism which had been made. It had been urged that the effect of our obtaining control over the sources of salt manufacture would be to cause hardship to large numbers of the people in the Native States. The Government of India had every reason to believe that the contrary would be the case. Very ample compensation had been made, not only to the Chiefs, but to the people, directly and indirectly. He would not weary the House by entering into any detail, but would merely express the belief of the Government of India that the general result would unquestionably be a great balance of advantage to them. He believed that, when these arrangements were complete, it might be necessary to wait until the stocks of salt which might still be in the hands of traders, and which otherwise might escape taxation, had been disposed of. These, however, were matters of detail, and it might safely be said that no serious obstacle now existed, and that very shortly the Government of Lord Lytton would have the satisfaction of abolishing what had been called the commercial and political scandal of the Inland Customs line. Of course, it would have been very agreeable to have been able to effect that object while fixing a lower uniform rate than 2 rupees 8 annas; and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had, he thought, been in favour of endeavouring to approximate to a rate of 2 rupees. But, in the present state of our finances, this would have been impossible. In Madras and Bombay, undoubtedly, the effect of the increase required to be carefully watched, but to a very large part of the population of India much cheaper salt would be available; and he hoped that he was not too sanguine in anticipating from the abolition of the line, and from the other arrangements that would be made, a great stimulus to the internal trade of the country. He was confident that the House would hear with great satisfaction of the accomplishment of this long-desired reform, and would appreciate the perseverance and energy of Lord Lytton and Sir John Strachey, with whose names it would hereafter be honourably associated. Few, in fact, would dispute the advantage of abolishing the Customs line. But the question had been raised in "another place" whether the moment was opportune for doing it, and whether it was desirable to impose fresh taxation upon the people of India for the purpose. His answer to that criticism of Lord Northbrook was that, as a matter of fact, no new taxation had been required for this purpose. The effect of raising the salt tax in one part of India while diminishing it in the other had been, in the opinion of the Government of India, to leave the salt revenue just where it was. In other words, this reform had been effected by a new distribution of the charge, and not by a diminution of Revenue. Treating, therefore, these re-adjustments of the salt duty as a whole, and putting them on one side as not affecting the Revenue one way or the other, we arrived at the conclusion that the new taxation was not wanted for the purpose of Revenue. It was imposed on different grounds and for different objects. Intimately connected with the Customs line was the question of the inland sugar duties, for without that line their maintenance would be impossible. Sugar was one of the most important products of our own people in Northern India; but the effect of the Customs line was to place artificial obstructions upon its export. "So far as competition exists," said Sir John Strachey, "the duty acts as a protective duty in favour of foreign and against our own sugar." Believing that that state of things was intolerable, and also that the duty could in no circumstances be maintained much longer, the Government of India determined to make provision, in the ordinary Budget of the year, for its immediate abolition. Another great object which the Government of India had placed before itself had been the amendment of the Customs tariff. The English tariff had been framed upon the principle of levying a large revenue from a small number of articles of universal consumption; but there being no articles, except cotton manufactures, which were imported into India for universal consumption, the Indian tariff was framed on the opposite principle of drawing a little revenue from a great number of articles. Successive reforms had since so reduced the export tariff that only three duties now remained—on rice, lac, and indigo. But the import tariff, on the contrary, even after the reforms of 1875, contained no less than 62 items, some of them realizing only an insignificant revenue, and hardly justifying the trouble of collection and the necessary interference with trade. It had, therefore, been decided at once to relieve the tariff of 27 of these numbers, of which the most important were fruit and vegetables, so much used for the food of the poorer classes, and materials for railways. But the most important change had been the attempt—small in itself, but as great as financial considerations would allow—to deal with the vexed questions of the import duties upon cotton. Hon. Members would recollect that in the last Session a Resolution of the House, unanimously passed, declared that these duties, being protective in their nature, ought to be abolished as soon as the finances would permit. On the present occasion, it was abundantly clear that any large sacrifice of Income was hardly possible. Rather, however, than leave the matter in its former unsatisfactory condition, the Government of India had endeavoured to eliminate the duties upon the coarser descriptions of cotton goods which were beyond any doubt protective in their nature. These had been exempted from duty, and though Her Majesty's Government felt that a good deal yet remained to be done to carry to a completion the policy which they had expressed, and which the House had accepted, he thought he was entitled to claim some credit for the Government of India for the considerable steps which they had now taken, not only in this particular matter, but in the general reform of the Customs tariff. The House would, therefore, observe that in the Estimate for 1878-9, which he was now about to place before it, the Government had to provide, in the first place, for a Famine insurance fund £1,500,000, for the various reforms which he had indicated; and, lastly, they had to secure that margin between Income and Expenditure which was especially necessary in India, and which past experience had shown ought not to be less than £500,000. The Budget Estimates for 1878-9, inclusive of the Revenue from productive Public Works, were as follows:—Revenue, £63,195,000; Expenditure, £61,039,000; leaving a surplus of £2,156,000. But as the loss by the recent remission of salt duty in Northern India was estimated at £150,000, the expected surplus stood, as nearly as possible, at £2,000,000. Comparing these with the regular Estimates for 1877-8, and including, in both cases, the Famine charges, the result was an improvement of more than £5,500,000. But, in order to make a proper comparison, it was more convenient to eliminate Famine expenditure altogether. Excluding, therefore, all plainly distinguishable expenditure on Famine, the net increase of Revenue on the present year was estimated at £4,500,000; and of Expenditure at £3,750,000. Of these excesses, £2,750,000, more or less, on each side of the account, were due only to the incorporation in the general accounts of provincial Income and Expenditure. The effect of the changes in taxation was as follows: — The new licence taxes were expected to yield £765,000; but might not, perhaps, be quite so productive the first year. The new rates upon land, £450,000. These rates would not be levied in the North-West Provinces and Oude until September; and were therefore expected, in future years, to yield a further amount of £55,000. The increased salt duty was taken at £247,000, but would now stand at £97,000. On the other hand, the loss by the remission of the sugar duty was £155,000, and by the removal of the import duties on cotton yarns and other items in the tariff, £77,000. But for the abolition of these duties the Revenue from Customs would have shown a rise of £82,000. The principal increase of Income was under the head of Land Revenue, of which a full estimate for an ordinary year was now taken, besides the arrears which it was hoped to collect, though their exact amount must be a little uncertain. The amount was taken at £1,968,000 in excess of last year; Excise, for the same reason, was expected to yield an excess of £248,000. Opium, of which the crop was deficient, showed a net fall of £480,000; but the last accounts were satisfactory. The Mint receipts were less by £269,000, and the net receipts from the guaranteed railways were very prudently taken at the large decrease of £869,000. On the Expenditure side of the account, he was glad to record a decrease of £632,000 in Army charges, of which £430,000 was in the cost of stores to be supplied from England. The House would also be glad to hear that the long-pending question as to the proper sum to be paid by the India Office for the Effective Services had been finally settled for all past years, and that there was every probability of a basis being arrived at to regulate these payments, at any rate, for a term of years. The great cause of the increase of Expenditure was one which he had not yet mentioned—namely, the loss by Exchange, which amounted, in the present year, to no less than £3,000,000, as against £1,600,000 for the year 1877-8. It was true that this was to some extent an exaggerated view of the actual loss to India, because these calculations were based on the conventional system of reckoning 10 rupees to the pound; but still, due allowance being made for this fact, no one could deny that the financial difficulty presented by the Indian Exchange was enormous. The rate of exchange during the current year was estimated at 1*s* 8·4*d*., and though there had been a temporary depression on the silver market, he was glad to say no further loan would be required from Parliament on the present occasion. No doubt, plausible excuses might have been made out for a loan, the effect of which would have been to relieve the present anxiety of the Government in the matter of exchange; but it was felt that there was no substantial ground for it, and it would only be an aggravation of their difficulties in the future. While upon the subject of Debt, perhaps he might be allowed to say a word as to the proposed conversion of the Five-and-a-Half per Cent Loan which was announced yesterday, and in which two forms of application were proposed. The first form of promissory note was an excessively simple one; but the Government of India was of opinion that some holders might be afraid of a rupee loan because of the fluctuating value of silver. They thought, however, that they might be induced to go into a loan which was practically calculated upon a gold basis, and hence the second form was suggested. The difference amounted to this—applicants under the first form would receive less if the market rate of silver fell, and applicants under the second form would, if the official rate fell, receive a larger number of rupees for their 7*s*. per cent. Passing from this subject, he had to remark that under the new form of account, for which they were very much indebted to the noble Lord the present Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton), it would be possible, in future, to present to the House what he might call the productive Public Works Budget—that was to say, a statement of the income and expenditure of productive public works. For the first time, these public works were treated as commercial transactions. The accounts now included the whole revenue derived from them, and, on the other side, their annual working expenses, including the guaranteed interest, and the interest upon that part of the Debt of India which was estimated to have been incurred for these works, and which had now been separated from the permanent Debt. The consequence of this would eventually be that the accounts would show clearly the results produced by our capital outlay on public works, which before could only be got out in a very unsatisfactory manner. It was most desirable that these details should be in their possession at the earliest possible moment, so that they might, as it were, take stock of what had already been done before they embarked upon fresh undertakings. No branch of the Public Expenditure required greater watchfulness, and it was only by the test of past experience that they could impose any adequate check. It was as yet impossible, however, to give the House definite information in regard to irrigation works. There were some parts of India where they had not yet been able to discriminate between what proportion of Land Revenue was due to irrigation works and what was not; and, therefore, he thought it advisable, rather than give an incomplete statement, to pass over that subject altogether on the present occasion. In saying this, he wished to guard himself from being supposed to depreciate in any way the results of irrigation; it seemed to him the greatest possible absurdity, which seemed to pervade some minds, that it was necessary to depreciate one class of public works in order to enhance the value of the other. In his opinion, India required both. Both, if pushed on with foresight and prudence, would be of the greatest advantage. Coming now to railways, the first thing to be noticed was that since 1853 there had been opened 7,500 miles of line at a cost upon guaranteed railways of £95,500,000, and upon State railways of £17,500,000. The financial results of that expenditure were now to be seen in the accounts. As regarded guaranteed railways, and bearing in mind that the trunk lines were only completed in 1871, it was not, he thought, unsatisfactory to find that, a quarter of a century after the opening of the first line, the net traffic receipts had exceeded the guaranteed interest by the substantial sum of £290,000. To put the result in a different form, the gross earnings of these railways had increased in five years by no less than 70 per cent. He was quite aware that the circumstances of the past year had been somewhat exceptional, the receipts having been swelled enormously by the Famine traffic; but, on the other hand, the necessity of providing for the Famine, and the preference given to consignments of grain, caused a certain amount of traffic of a more profitable kind to be lost. All necessary allowance made, the estimate for 1878-9 was less than that of last year by £750,000. The receipts from these railways, however, judging from the past, might very possibly exceed that moderate estimate. The State railways, he was sorry to say, did not at present show so satisfactory a result; but the House would recollect that they were supplementary to the main lines already referred to. Besides, some of them had been constructed much more for military than financial considerations. These dead-weight obligations were now almost at an end. It was satisfactory to observe, however, that the balance of Income over Expenditure was gradually increasing. It was £263,000 this year, as against £131,000 last year. The time had not yet come for pronouncing any opinion upon these results; but towards the formation of that opinion the labours of the Public Works Committee, now sitting, would afford very material assistance. Apart from financial results, however, it was impossible to deny that the railways had proved very useful. They had enormously strengthened our position as a military Power in India, and they had most materially tended to mitigate the Famine. Lord Lytton spoke of them in the highest terms. He said—

> "It is an unquestionable fact that the railways, and the railways alone, were the salvation of the situation in North Behar during the Famine of 1874, and that they have again been the salvation of the situation in Madras during the Famine of the present year. The sea, no doubt, would have thrown rice into the town of Madras; but with the cattle dying of drought, it would have been impossible to move the grain up country; nor, if every possible mile of navigable canal had been completed throughout the Madras Presidency, would it have greatly helped us to throw grain into those very districts where the Famine has been at its worst, for the broken upland country of Bellary and Kurnool and the Mysore plateau are physically impracticable for big canals; and had there been no railway within reach of these districts, the people where they have now died by hundreds must have assuredly succumbed by thousands."

On the same subject, Sir John Strachey said—

> "Having mentioned these railways, I will ask you not to forget that at least four-fifths of the food imported into the Famine country travelled over them, and I believe that the average journey made by each bag of grain was hardly less than 500 miles. When it is remembered that barely one quarter of this food could have reached the Famine districts at all without the railways, some idea may be formed of the millions of lives they have saved and of the priceless boon they have conferred upon the country."

Lastly, the Government of Bombay said—

> "It is difficult to measure the value of the railway at such a time as this, or the magnitude of the calamity which, without it, must have supervened. If these events had happened before the construction of the railway, the misfortunes of the people and the responsibilities of Government would have been indefinity increased."

There was one more subject on which he thought it right to touch, and that was the trade of India. No doubt, the figures which he had to lay before the House were very satisfactory, and were full of promise for the future of India, as showing, in a year when £6,500,000 had been spent in Famine relief, and almost the whole autumn harvest of Upper India was lost, a general improvement in the condition of the people and the flourishing state of trade. In the figures which he was about to place before the House he purposely excluded treasure, because the movement of silver was influenced by so many considerations, such as the Government policy as to the construction of railways, or as to the Secretary of State's Bills in this country; but, taking merchandize alone, and adding together the gross exports and imports, they had abundant proof of the real and advancing prosperity of the country. The average annual value of the exports and imports in the four quinquennial periods since the Mutiny was as follows: — First five years, £52,000,000; second—which included the cotton famine years—£85,000,000; third, £89,000,000; fourth, £93,000,000; while, in 1877-8, the year next following, the total was no less than £106,600,000. In other words, the trade of India had doubled in 20 years. Comparing this result with previous individual years, they found that the imports of merchandize, which had fallen in the previous year, rose to a point very nearly £2,250,000 in excess of the highest year on record. The exports showed an increase of more than £4,000,000, and had only been exceeded by the three cotton famine years, 1863-6. The imports of treasure showed an increase of £6,000,000 over the previous year, and of £12,000,000 over 1875-6. The low rate of exchange had undoubtedly given an artificial stimulus to some branches of the export trade. But the opening of the Suez Canal, and the reform of the tariff, might be reckoned among causes which were likely to be permanent and to tend to still further development. The growth of the wheat trade was the most remarkable of all. It dated its existence from 1873, when the export duty was taken off, and a rise occurred in European markets. Not being an article of food in Southern India, it had been exported in spite of the Famine, and the diminished rates of transport by railway had largely contributed to its increase. In both of the two previous years the export of wheat doubled that of the year preceding in quantity and value; and yet, in 1877-8, it increased 13 per cent in quantity and 46 per cent in value, the total value of the wheat exported in that year being £2,857,000. Of this export, four-fifths came to England, and India had stood third among the countries supplying wheat to England. In the present year, the abundant harvest in America and elsewhere might very probably have the effect of causing a large diminution in the export of Indian wheat. But, looking to the enormous capacities for production, and the readier means of export likely to be soon afforded by the railway to Kurrachee, it was impossible not to feel sanguine as to its permanence. The export of seeds afforded another remarkable instance of growth. For some years previous to 1875 it made, speaking generally, no advance. The removal of the duty in that year had produced the result that, in the year last past, it was double in quantity, and more than double in value, what it was in 1875. The same proof of the advantages conferred upon the Indian cultivator by the removal of export duties was shown by the satisfactory growth of the trade in jute, and especially in tea, where the progress had been regular over a series of years. Even rice, for which there was an enormous demand in Southern India, while showing a diminution in quantity, exceeded in value the amount recorded in any previous year. The export of cotton, he regretted to say, still continued to decline considerably, and though something might be attributed to the greater amount now worked up in India itself, the prospects of this trade could not be called satisfactory. Happily, other articles of export had been found to take its place. In his opinion, these facts justified him in looking hopefully at the prospects of the trade of India. But, even in the event of hon. Members thinking that he had taken too sanguine a view of this or any other matter connected with the financial future of India, he could assure the House that he had not done so with the idea of under-rating the difficulties which he had to encounter. He did not forget the precarious nature of the opium revenue, although he thought that the probability of a fall in the income from that source had been exaggerated. But of their rocks ahead, of all the circumstances which, at the present time, had threatened the disturbance of their calculations, two stood especially prominent. The first was the depreciation in the value of silver, a problem which at present seemed to be beyond their solution, and the gravity of which it was hardly possible to exaggerate. The other was the recurrence of famine, to meet which, in the future, so far as human foresight could do so, an honest attempt had been made this year. The prospects, too, of the season were not unfavourable. Rain was in a few parts excessive, and in one or two districts of the North-West, reported as still insufficient; but, generally speaking, the prospects were very favourable, and prices slowly falling. And although he was afraid that in all parts and seasons it would be impossible to avoid local scarcity, yet it was to be hoped that after the terrible cycle of years of famine which had been gone through, Providence was now about to bestow the blessings of plenty upon the country, and thus to conduce to the prosperity and happiness of the people of India. He begged to move that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Mr. FAWCETT, in rising to move—

"That this House regards with apprehension the present position of Indian finance, and in view of the power claimed by the Crown to employ any number of Indian Troops in all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, except the United Kingdom, is of opinion that there is no sufficient security against the Military expenditure of India being unduly increased;"

commented upon the fact that there were but few hon. Members in the House to consider the great question of our Imperial responsibilities in India, while the Government would not venture to ask them to consider a Bill relating to Irish public-houses or English turnpikes under such circumstances. Month after month, week after week, and day after day, some hon. Members who sat on his side of the House had been taunted that they only cared for little England, and not for our great Imperial responsibilities. ["Hear, hear!"] He heard someone say "Hear, hear;" but he would wish to ask those Gentlemen how they were now about to discharge those responsibilities they had already taken upon themselves? He thought the common sense of the people of England would say that if the English Parliament and House of Commons were so hard pressed that the many important measures which had been brought in were considered thus with three-fourths of those Members who were left in London away from the House, it would be better to care for those responsibilities we had than to assume others of which very little was known. With regard to the statement of the Under Secretary of State for India, he had nothing to complain of the tone of his speech. On the contrary, he felt he was expressing the feeling of every hon. Member when he said that there were many expressions of opinion in that speech which received the cordial approval of both sides of the House. He was also willing to admit that nothing could be more lucid than the manner in which the accounts were laid before the House. He could not help saying, however, that that statement was based upon a wrong hypothesis, while the figures were calculated to mislead rather than give a correct idea of the present financial position of India. There were three cardinal positions connected with Indian finance to which he wished to draw attention—First, that the real Expenditure of India was steadily increasing in a proportion largely exceeding the growth of the Revenue, and that the deficiency thereby caused had to be made good by constant additions to the taxation of the people; secondly, that India was a poor country, that we had almost entirely exhausted every available source of taxation, and that it was impossible to further increase the amount of taxation without causing such serious discontent as would gravely affect our position in that country; and, thirdly, that quite recently certain circumstances had occurred which were likely in the future to make the Expenditure of India far more largely exceed the Revenue than it did at the present time, or in past years. The Under Secretary of State had represented the Revenue of India in the year 1877 to be £55,000,000; in 1878, £59,000,000; and the present year's Estimates represented it as £62,000,000. Such figures he (Mr. Fawcett) characterized as absolutely fallacious, and he asserted that the real net Revenue of India was certainly not one shilling more than £39,000,000; and in making that assertion he was quoting a high authority—the present Finance Minister of India, who said that the Revenue of India could not be estimated at more than £38,000,000. If that was the case, what was the use of misleading the House—of course, unintentionally — and misleading the country, and everyone who took any interest in Indian finances, by parading the figures £55,000,000, £59,000,000 and even £62,000,000? The statement which he had made perhaps required some explanation; and he would inquire how the Revenue quoted by the Under Secretary of State was made up? Why, simply by including all sorts of items, which were not in the least items of Revenue, but simply items of Account. As an instance, he would take one of the items for Revenue in the 1877 Accounts. It was — "Military receipts, £1,000,000." What was the use, he asked, of putting that item down as Revenue when, under the same heading on the other side, there was an expenditure of £17,000,000? The Revenue could easily be swelled in that manner. Then there was the item put down of "Gained by Exchange, £500,000," in reference to the depreciation of silver; while, on the other hand, there was a loss by Exchange of £2,000,000. Certain things were put down as items of Revenue, which in England were real items of Revenue, but which in India were items of loss—such as £780,000 for the Post Office, while the expenditure was £860,000, and £150,000 for Telegraphs with the expenditure at £560,000. Those items, therefore, were not actually Revenue, and should not be considered so. There were other instances of the same kind. There were in India, practically, only five items of Revenue. Revenue was derived from land, then there were Customs and Excise, then salt, then opium, and stamps. For 1877 the gross Revenue under those five heads was—from land, £19,800,000; from Customs and Excise, £5,000,000; salt, £6,250,000; opium, £9,000,000; and stamps, £2,750,000; making a total of £43,000,000. But if they took the other side of the question, it would be seen that the cost against that sum for collecting these five items was a little more than £6,000,000. In this way we found the correctness of the Estimate of the present Finance Minister of India, that the net Revenue, instead of being £55,000,000 or £62,000,000, or anything like that, was no more than £37,000,000. Unless they kept that fact in view, they would never obtain a correct view of the position of Indian finance. The yearly Expenditure exceeded the Revenue by something like £4,000,000; and the result was that they were obliged to make up the deficiency by perpetually borrowing and resorting to Exchequer Bills. The yearly expenditure upon railways was £3,000,000, and the return this year from railways was only £290,000. Then as to the irrigation works, the Government could not give the House any return on those works. On the last occasion on which he spoke on India in that House, he said that £9,000,000 had been spent on irrigation works in Bengal, every sixpence of which was put down as extraordinary Expenditure, and the Under Secretary of State had reluctantly to confess that the return on that outlay was not more than ½ per cent per annum. The Debt of India was steadily increasing at the rate of at least £4,000,000 a-year. The result of the system at present pursued by the Government of India had been to cover India with a great network of provincial and local taxation. Those taxes seldom came under the cognizance of the House; but in India he believed they had produced more discontent than Imperial taxation. It was a fact that in a single month of the present year, in February, local taxes were imposed which yielded something like £1,500,000. He complained of the course taken with reference to the salt tax. The course taken was most unjust, as it raised the duty on salt something like 40 per cent in those parts of India which were the poorest and which were just recovering from a most terrible famine. The increase of the duty in Madras and Bombay was 11 annas per maund; but Lord Hobart, who formerly was responsible for the government of Madras, refused to entertain a proposal to increase the salt tax by three annas, even at a time when that Presidency was not stricken down by famine. According to the statements made this evening, nearly 1,500,000 people had been swept away by the most fearful of all visitations. He would next bring under the notice of the House one of the most terrible things in connection with this increase of taxation. It meant taking more from the poor. The salt duty could not be increased 40 per cent without diminishing still further the incomes of the poor ryots of Madras. And what did Lord Salisbury say? And this brought into the full glare of light the inconsistency of associating with famine increased taxation. Lord Salisbury, speaking with the authority of a Secretary of State, said—

> "The mortality and suffering caused by the recent famine were not due to a want of food or to a want of means in bringing that food. There was always sufficient food; but the mortality and suffering were due to the fact that the people had not the means of buying food when it was brought to them."

And yet, after such an admission from Lord Salisbury himself, this additional taxation was imposed upon the people. With regard to the increase of the licence tax, the Under Secretary of State alleged that it had been rendered much more just, inasmuch as very small incomes were now exempted. It was not to be imposed on incomes of less than 100 rupees a-year; but this meant that income tax would be levied from people who earned only 4*s*. a-week. But there was one feature of this licence tax which the Under Secretary of State had omitted to notice, and if that was the only feature in connection with it, it absolutely condemned it. This tax was imposed to meet what was described as a great national emergency; but how was that emergency met? Why, they imposed a licence tax to which every person in the receipt of an official or professional income was most carefully and rigorously exempted from contributing a single sixpence. Hon. Members could easily understand that discontent was caused by this unfortunate system of taxation. In every large town in India indignation meetings were held to protest against this incredibly unjust scheme of taxation; and the people of India, in the last resort, called upon the House of Commons to secure for them justice in this matter. He had thus far confined his remarks to the increase of Imperial taxation. He desired, however, to direct the attention of the House to that branch of the subject which the Under Secretary of State had altogether omitted to notice. Lord Northbrook had stated that in Bengal alone, since 1870, the increase in local taxation had been £1,000,000, and the increase in local taxes throughout India during the last seven years had been no less than £3,000,000 per annum. So that, while the Imperial taxation had been increased, there had been a great rise in local taxes also. He would now consider the second branch of the inquiry to which he wished to direct the attention of the House. What did increased taxation mean in India? India was so poor, that there were scarcely any available sources of taxation beyond those which had been already taken up. India was, at least eight times as populous as England, and yet the whole amount of Customs and Excise duties was only £5,000,000, or about one-tenth of the sum raised in England. It was impossible to adduce a more conclusive proof of the poverty of India. Again, look at the Income Tax. The last time the Income Tax was imposed in India a sum of 2½*d.* per pound produced £500,000. In England a similar amount produced £5,000,000. Additional Revenue could not be raised without resorting to taxation, which was so burdensome to the people as to produce most serious discontent. Lord Mayo said, the year before he died—

> "The increase of taxation which for years has been going on in India is producing a most serious amount of discontent, and this discontent, if it continues, will be a political danger, the magnitude of which can scarcely be exaggerated."

Since these memorable words had been uttered, the increase both of Imperial and local taxation had been going on far faster in India than during Lord Mayo's time. Lord Northbrook had, on going out to India, examined into the soundness of Lord Mayo's opinion, and the result of his investigation had been to confirm every word that had fallen from Lord Mayo. Thus two successive Governors General had declared the increase of taxation to be a grave political danger. Lord Salisbury had also made an equally significant remark, when he said that there was this distinction between India and England—that there could be in England a considerable increase of taxation without in the slightest degree affecting the stability of our institutions; but such was not the case in India. These memorable words of Lord Salisbury ought to be borne in mind by every one connected with the Administration of India. It could not, or ought not to, be forgotten, that a penny wasted in the administration of Indian affairs was equally serious with a sovereign wasted in the management or mismanagement of Home affairs. But to relieve the Famine, what had been done? Why, out of nearly £9,500,000 which were spent in connection with the Famine, the Government had been obliged to borrow every single shilling with the exception of £1,000,000, and in order to obtain that £1,000,000 a licence tax had to be imposed on incomes of £10 a-year, and the salt tax had to be increased. And this £1,500,000 was not to be allowed to accumulate as a reserve for future famines; but every single sixpence of the additional taxation which was being raised was to be invested in public works, the returns of which were so uncertain that it could not be proved that the public works which were being constructed would pay half the interest on the capital which was being employed on them. It was clear that the additional amount of Revenue could not be raised in India without imposing additional taxes upon the people—taxes which would be absolutely intolerable, and which the people would be simply unable to bear, notwithstanding the jugglery which had in late years been attempted in regard to Indian taxation. Nothing could, as far as he knew, be more perilous or suicidal even than an attempt to impose additional taxation of this kind upon India—indeed, he could not but think that any proposal of the kind would prove a source of great political danger to the Indian Empire. He now came to the third position which he wished to establish, and that was that lately certain causes had come into operation which were likely to make the Expenditure of India far more largely exceed its real Revenue in the future than it had done in the past. The two causes which were contributing chiefly to this result were these—the loss by Exchange, and the increase in the Military Charges. The Under Secretary of State had remarked that the loss by Exchange was one of those misfortunes affecting the finance of India which it was impossible for them to control. He (Mr. Fawcett) admitted that they could not control that loss now; but that was all the more reason why they should make up their minds to regulate those items of Indian Expenditure which could be controlled. Even if silver should not become far more depreciated than it had been, they were likely, in future years, to lose more than they had lost in past years; because the loss by Exchange in past years they had, to a considerable extent, averted, owing to the opportunity which they had of borrowing large sums in England, and in that way diminishing the amount which had to be remitted to India. But they had exhausted their borrowing powers in England; and, consequently, every sixpence of the £17,000,000 of Home Charges would have to be remitted from India to England. What made the matter more serious was this—that the amount of the Home Charges was more likely to increase than decrease. There had been an increase during the last three years. That loss could not be met by any currency juggling. It arose from the fact that the Revenue was received in silver, and the Debt was paid in gold, and so a larger proportion of Revenue was wanted to pay the Debt in India. It was a loss that could not be avoided; but it rendered it the more imperative that we should economize the Revenues of India. Then as to the military expenditure in India, he feared that what had been done this year would give a stimulus to an increased expenditure; and it could not now be estimated at less than £17,000,000, and it even was more than that if they took into calculation the expenditure for military purposes. They were expending £30,000,000 of money at a time when there was the profoundest peace—a peace so profound that the Government could take away from India thousands of troops thousands of miles for employment in Europe. They should remember that India was a poor country—a country in which the great mass of the people earned only 4*d*. or 5*d*. a-day, and where there was no wealthy middle class, and that the population was so poor that it could not bear an expenditure of £17,000,000 for military purposes. The cause of much of the increase in that expenditure was due to the amalgamation of the Indian and English Armies, which had been done against the remonstrances and advice of every English stasesman. The strength of the Armies had not been increased by this, while the military expenditure had been augmented by £4,000,000. If we had back those £4,000,000, there would be no need for increased burdens; no need for an imposition of an Income Tax on incomes of £10 a-year; and no need for an increase of the salt tax.

The military expenditure of India had not yet come to its worst; for, on the authority of Sir John Strachey, the military expenditure had increased in India by £1,000,000 on the Home Charges, over which India had no control and was scarcely consulted, and with regard to which she had no power or remonstrance. In fact, the gravity of that fact could scarcely be over-rated; because, from what had happened that year, the military expenditure was likely to be seriously increased. It might be said that he was, in mentioning these facts, attacking the policy of Her Majesty's Government in bringing Indian troops to Europe. Nothing could be further from his intention. That matter had been disposed of, and he accepted the decision of the House upon it. What he had to advance was consistent with even an enthusiastic approval here of that policy. What he wished to show was, that that policy would injuriously affect the financial position of India. If Her Majesty's Government were to continue the policy of employing Indian troops anywhere out of the United Kingdom, there were two suppositions arising from it—either that the number would be so small that their places need not be filled up by fresh troops being raised in India, or that their number would be so large that it would not be safe to denude India of them, and that fresh levies must take their place. If India could safely spare the 7,000 men that had recently been brought to the Mediterranean, he thought she might be spared the £1,000,000 or so which they cost. But he did not think Her Majesty's Government meant to confine themselves to 7,000 men. It was said that the policy pursued had made little England a great country, and that it had been so important that Russia had turned back in alarm. But Lord Lawrence stated at the time of the Abyssinian War that India could not spare more than 12,000 troops. Then if 50,000 were required in Europe or elsewhere, they would have to raise 50,000 fresh troops in India to take their places. What would happen when the services of these Indian troops were no longer wanted in Europe? The moment they set foot again on the shores of India that country would become responsible for their support, and she could not disband or pension them without a serious inroad upon her finances. Thus by an exercise of the Prerogative, without deigning to consult those responsible for the finances of India, Her Majesty's Government might saddle India with serious financial burdens. The Indian Army henceforth was not merely to be an Army for the defence and security of India; but an Army ready at a moment's notice to serve as a Reserve for Imperial purposes. This being the case, would there not be a great temptation to maintain in India a larger Army than her own security required? In fact, reductions which had been formerly contemplated in the Indian Army were now rendered impossible. Therefore, he said it was absolutely necessary that some safeguards should be designed, besides those that already existed, in order to prevent India being treated as a mere military Reserve for Imperial purposes. Lord Northbrook had well said that the employment of Indian Troops in Europe placed Indian Charges in an entirely new position; because, Lord Northbrook asked, what were they doing? At present, if India had English troops, she had to pay for the cost of recruiting and training; but if England wanted Indian troops, she did not pay a sixpence for the recruiting or training of those troops. Was this just treatment of India? He might be asked to state what he would propose to do under the circumstances which he had described. Well, he would rather reduce the military expenditure in India than run the risk of imposing additional taxation upon India. This should be the key of their policy—this was the policy of Lord Northbrook when he filled the office of Governor General of India; and he believed it could be done without reducing the Army, but by an alteration in the formation of the Army, which would cause reduction of expenditure. If, therefore, the Army could not be reduced in India without danger, unless additional taxation was imposed, he would rather that the Army should be reduced to the smallest number than that additional taxation should be imposed. The same remark applied to public works in India. He would rather that there were more public works going on in India than was the case at present, if there was a surplus that could be so employed; but he objected to their running the risk of incurring additional taxation by borrowing money to spend on public works, which experience told them might yield a very inadequate return with which to pay the interest even on the borrowed money. The position of India in regard to public works was, in fact, the position of an embarrassed landlord who could not carry out improvements which would not be directly productive. In the present condition of India, he thought it the height of imprudence to carry out any public works which involved borrowing, and leading to increased taxation. Everyone connected with the Government of India should take this lesson to heart—that hitherto she had been too extravagantly and too expensively governed. India had been governed as if she were the richest, instead of one of the poorest countries in the world. He did not mean that the public servants in India were too well paid; but he did mean to say that India could not bear the costly Administration which she now had; and it was a monstrous injustice that £22,000 should be expended upon a State barge; £155,000 in building a country house for a governor of a Presidency, and £20,000 in furnishing it; and that these sums should come out of the pockets of the poorest people, who had to pay an additional salt duty. These were facts which should be thought of by the people of this country. He believed they would never know how economically India could be governed until they endeavoured to see how far it could be governed through Native agency. Until three years ago, so strong was the prejudice against employing Native labour that no engine-drivers were Natives; but during the last three years 150 had been employed, and the result had been a saving of £1,500 a-year, as each Native driver received only one-tenth of what the Government or company was formerly obliged to pay. The consulting engineer of the Government admitted that the Native drivers worked longer hours than Europeans, gave less trouble, and altogether did their work more satisfactorily. These facts showed that it was possible to effect great economy if we could get rid of race prejudice, and employ Natives in positions for which they were qualified. Every day he lived, and every day he devoted attention to the subject, he became more deeply impressed with the conviction that if they went on with their present policy—increasing the taxation and adding to the Debt—there was only one inevitable result, and that was a financial embarrassment which would be a grave misfortune to India, and which would bring the greatest discredit upon our own country. No one felt more strongly than he did that, in attempting to govern the vast population of our Indian Dependency, we had assumed, perhaps, the greatest responsibility—call it, if they pleased, an Imperial responsibility—which had ever been assumed by any country. If that responsibility was adequately discharged great would be our advantage and great would be our honour; but if that responsibility was neglected, great would be our shame and lasting would be our humiliation. He appealed to the English Parliament and the English people to do all in their power to secure a juster, a wiser, and a more economical administration of the finances of our great Indian Dependency.

Mr. DILLWYN seconded the Amendment. He complained that this question should be brought on within a few days of the Prorogation of Parliament, and that comparatively few Members were present on this occasion. He was aware that a great Naval Review at Spithead might account for the absence of some hon. Gentlemen; but it was unfortunate that the Review and the Indian Budget should have been fixed for the same day. Not only, however, had the Review been fixed for the same day as the Indian Budget, but the Government had offered to place a vessel at the disposal of hon. Gentlemen who wished to witness the proceedings at Spithead, as if there was not very important Business to be attended to within the House itself. He hoped that in future years the question of Indian finance would be brought forward at an earlier stage. If we were to retain India, we should take better care of its government. From the able Statement of the Under Secretary of State, he inferred that the available Revenue of India was from £55,000,000 to £61,000,000—say £58,000,000; while the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) did not make it more than £37,000,000 or£38,000,000. He trusted that in the course of the debate it would be cleared up which was the correct figure.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House regards with apprehension the present position of Indian finance, and in view of the power claimed by the Crown to employ any number of Indian Troops in all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, except the United Kingdom, is of opinion that there is no sufficient security against the Military expenditure of India being unduly increased,"—(Mr. Fawcett,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD said, he was sure he expressed the general feeling of the House, when he congratulated his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India (Mr. E. Stanhope) on the exceedingly interesting and able Statement he had made on the finances of India. It had this peculiar merit—it was simple, clear, and not at all diffuse, considering the large field over which he had to range. He must also offer his tribute to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) for his able handling of the subject, and the admirable colouring he threw on the picture he sketched of that great country. But he had rather, unintentionally, no doubt, misrepresented in effect the condition of the Revenue of India. He had stated the Revenue at £35,000,000, while the Under Secretary of State had put it at £55,000,000. In truth, the total Revenue was a matter of account; and the accounts were made up in a very unsatisfactory manner. According to accounts stated in a simplified form, the Revenue of India for 1876-7 was £35,700,000, and the Expenditure of the same year £36,700,000. That was the real result of the comparison. Then came what was properly distinguished as the Revenue and Expenditure for reproductive works. He hoped before they had another Indian Budget such a state of accounts would be produced as would simplify the whole aspect of Indian finance, so as no longer to lead the House into the awkward doubt whether the Revenue was £35,000,000 or £55,000,000. In regard to extraordinary Expenditure, he thought the observations of the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett) perfectly well-founded. There was nothing more dangerous than making entries of extraordinary Expenditure without reference to their nature. Nothing ought to appear under the head of extraordinary Expenditure for productive work except that which had an immediate tendency to have productive results. He was much struck by the remark of the hon. Member, that in India taxation was so contrived as to reach the very lowliest classes, and this, too, when our own Chancellor of the Exchequer only a short time ago had relieved incomes of £150 a-year from payment of the Income Tax.

General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR thanked the Under Secretary of State for the very satisfactory manner in which he had given an explanation of the finances of India, with the aid of the muddle into which the transactions had been thrown, by the unwise and confusing changes in the accounts of the present period. He had in former years called attention to the former state of the accounts and the alterations which had been introduced into the present set had increased the great difficulties which previously existed. He complained of the way in which the accounts were furnished, and said it was hardly possible to make them out. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) very properly pointed out that it would have been very easy to show the results both of Revenue and Charges in a clear and simple form. He was compelled to try and make out for himself the actual net Revenue and Expenditure, and he found that in 1867-8 the whole net Revenue actually available was £35,856,932, and in 1874-5 it was £37,430,934. These figures represented the net results of income, after clearing away all the formal receipts which sprang out of administration—for instance, the Post Office, Mint, Telegraph, Justice, were all sources of receipts; but when the charges were lessened by the income, then the actual net receipts, or net charges, were shown. With such accounts as had been now laid before the House, it was quite impossible for Members to do justice to India; and, for his own part, he was most anxious to do justice to a country in which he had spent so many years of his life. He had nothing but kindly feeling towards Viscount Cranbrook and the Under Secretary of State; but if the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) were present, he would have used an expression with regard to these new accounts which he himself would not like to use, and which ought not to be used except in very extreme cases. But now that they had the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London to the effect that the accounts could be presented in a clear and simple form, he was sure the Under Secretary of State would, on the next occasion, place the figures before the House in a way that Members could understand them. The Under Secretary of State had mentioned that there were two causes of the irregularities and changes in the accounts—one was the railways, and the other the public works. The public works of India were, no doubt, of great importance in respect to causing confusion in representing the transactions; but that evil was caused because we had, within the past few years, divided them into "ordinary" and "extraordinary." But when we added up the expenditure on both kinds of works, hon. Members would be astounded to hear that the total spent on these works 10 years ago was nearly the same as we spent now that we had divided them into "ordinary" and "extraordinary." In 1867-8, we spent on Indian public works of all kinds £6,575,089, of which the sum of £602,462 was for the first time designated extraordinary. In 1875-6, the expenditure on them was £7,393,137, and in 1876-7 the total outlay was £6,747,054, of which one-half nearly was for ordinary, and a little more than one-half for extraordinary, works. He defied anyone to find out now what the public work expenditure was. The accounts were so entirely changed that all the tables of prior years outlay were useless for contrast with the figures in the new accounts. The Under Secretary of State had said that the taxation in India on account of salt had not been increased. He was sorry to hear that statement from the hon. Gentleman; because, while the Government lowered the duty in Bengal, they sent it up in Madras and Bombay. Bengal, where the taxation was lowest, was favoured; while in Madras and Bombay, where taxation was heaviest, the people were made to suffer from an increase of the duty. There was no part of India more heavily taxed than the Madras Presidency. The land revenue there was infinitely heavier in rating than in Bengal, and it had increased since he was in Madras. Anyone who would examine the receipts in Madras from land would find the total collected to be far in excess of that of Bengal, notwithstanding that the Madras population was a little above the half of Bengal, and the area far below that of the favoured Presidency. The stamp duties, Excise, and other taxes, had also been largely increased. He asserted that the surplus Revenue of Madras, which went into the coffers of India, was upwards of £4,000,000. He, of course, excluded from his calculation Military charges, which ought to be spread over the whole of India. Three-quarters of a million, which was spent on troops for the Burmese territory, was charged on the Madras Presidency, as was also the sum required for troops in the Central Provinces of India. Yet Madras was now heavily taxed for salt, the increased impost upon which would throw an additional burden of £300,000 on that Presidency. This salt of Madras was the only article which nature had bestowed on Madras in a bountiful manner; but the English Government had laid hold of it to obtain an income of £1,500,000. Great injustice was inflicted on the people of Madras, who were not subject to a duty on salt before the year 1805. The Mahommedan Government from whom we took the lands of Madras had dealt far more leniently to the people, in regard to leaving this necessary untaxed, than England had done. There was no part of India so heavily taxed on its land as Madras was, having regard to the extent of the area under cultivation; and, in comparison with that Presidency, the Punjaub was not much more than half as much taxed, although it had about an equal area under cultivation. The lamentable thing was that moderation in taxing the people would prove far more lucrative. That was proved by the bound which income made when the transit dues were abolished; and again when the late Lord Harris, when Governor of Madras, made important reforms in respect of the land revenue, which he greatly reduced; and it was to be regretted that the good work which that noble Lord did had hardly ever been recognized. It was much to be desired that men in the present day would follow so excellent an example. The accounts showed that the Madras land revenue at once sprang up, and would even now rise if more liberality was shown. The fact was that Madras and her proceedings were ignored by the Central Government and by the Home authorities. The Indian Government and the India Office were overrun by the Bengal officials, and he had never heard of anything but prejudice and injustice towards Madras on the part of those officials. The curse of India was that hatred against the other Presidencies shown by the civilians of Bengal. Turning to the subject of the licence tax, the hon. and gallant Member strongly condemned that impost. Formerly, under it, the smith who used the hammer, the weaver, and even the dancing girls, were taxed, and the greatest wrong and oppression were committed. It was afterwards abolished, and with that abolition came in larger receipts from other sources; but now they had it introduced again, and unhappily, as usual, the poor and needy were the classes on whom the salt and licence taxes fell. He wished to protect the poor; because he felt that if the poor turned against us in India, our rule there was impossible. A small Army could march through the whole of India if we had a contented people. It was the want of food and of supplies, as well as of that security for our communications, and that co-operation which a contented people could give us, that he feared more than anything else in India. Much had been said about what should be the strength of the Army used for the occupation of that country. For himself, he could not state what its strength should be; but he was convinced they would never be able to maintain in India a sufficient Force to put down a discontented people. Lord Canning had told him they should maintain as large and as good an Army as they could for £12,500,000; and they formerly kept at a smaller expenditure a much larger Army than they did now. He said distinctly that their present Military expenditure was capable of being reduced. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had been right in saying that they ought to look carefully at the military charges in India; but, at the same time, there were others that equally demanded attention. It was a fact which the late Finance Minister of India (Sir John Strachey) entirely ignored. It suited his purpose to raise an outcry for diminution of expenditure, but he omitted to initiate it. The military charges, however, had fallen since the year 1867-8; whereas the cost of civil administration, which in 1868 was £10,372,000, had increased in 1875-6 to £12,577,000, and this notwithstanding the statement of Sir John Strachey that these charges had been reduced by £1,500,000. He trusted that there would be a thorough investigation into both the charges, civil as well as military, and a clear and explicit statement shown of the progress of expenditure since Lord Canning's Administration. No doubt, Military charges had largely increased; but the civil expenses had augmented in a higher ratio. Next he would remark on the very rapid manner in which the Debt had increased of late, as much as £32,000,000, or very nearly that sum, having been added in the last five or six years. It was impossible for any nation to go on borrowing at that rate without getting into serious difficulties. There was, however, some difficulty in understanding the Debt accounts, owing to the changes that had recently been made in their form, and which had made them, in some cases, more or less deceptive. It was worthy of note to know that within the past 35 years great changes had taken place in the mode of accounting. It was thereby rendered impossible for anyone not in possession of the secrets of office to connect the transactions for a continuing period. It was still more remarkable that these changes in the form of entering the figures were made at periods when the finances of India were getting into disorder. The new form of accounting and the new disorder had now again occurred. It was to be hoped that, whatever happened, they would have clearer accounts for the future, and not run blindfold into financial difficulties, than which none other could be more dangerous to our safety.

Mr. MAC IVER regarded the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) as a mischievous one, and distorted by Party feeling. It was unworthy of his position as an Indian reformer. In his opinion, there was no ground whatever for the blame which the hon. Member had cast upon the Government as regarded the period of the Session at which the Indian Budget was brought forward. It was true that the House was thin; but that was not their fault. Why were not the prominent Members of the Opposition in their places? At the present moment the front Opposition Bench was, and had been nearly all the evening, wholly unoccupied. That the Indian Budget should be brought forward in a thin House was at all times to be regretted; but it was particularly so on the present occasion, because he did not remember an Indian Budget ever being expounded more clearly than it had been that night. The hon. Member for Hackney seemed to him to have used arguments of a rather clap-trap character, particularly in reference to the taxation of incomes in India. Undoubtedly the licence tax cut too low, but yet the value of money was so different that matters were not really so bad as described. Four shillings a-week, no doubt, appeared to English eyes a ridiculously small income; but in Bombay such an income enabled a native to live in comparatively easy circumstances. He fully concurred in the view which the hon. Member took in condemning exemptions from the licence tax, which was the only weak point in the statement of the Under Secretary of State. The people did not object to that tax. They objected to the exemptions, and could not see why the tax should fall exclusively upon the mercantile community. There was no doubt that at present India was passing through a crisis of depression which affected the mercantile classes; but everybody acquainted with that country was aware that that depression was of a temporary character. He endorsed the remarks of the Under Secretary of State as to the great benefits which railway communication had already conferred on India.

MR. MUNTZ thought that the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) was one of the ablest to which he had ever listened. There was one thing which had always struck him very forcibly in connection with these debates, and that was that they were all alike. The Indian Financial Statement was made a few days before the close of the Session in a very thin House, and they were invariably told that India was in a flourishing condition; that the public works would be reproductive; and that in the long run all would be brought into good order. During all these years, however, the public Debt and the taxation had gone on increasing; and, at the present moment, the recent Return showed the internal liabilities to be £90,808,000, in addition to the Home Debt, the total amount being about £154,000,000; while in addition we were just about to make a new Loan of £10,000,000. He agreed that in many respects railways would be of vast advantage in bringing up food in cases of famine; but new public works ought not to be constructed unless there was a reasonable chance of their being reproductive. They had the high authority of Lord Napier of Magdala for saying that it would not be safe to reduce the strength of the Army in India. He (Mr. Muntz) concurred in that opinion; but he had yet to learn why we should give higher pay in India than we gave anywhere else. It was all very well to say that the Indian people were loyal and contented; but no nation could tolerate excessive taxation. A Debt could only be got rid of by increasing taxation or by lowering Expenditure. We had had famines in India, but no wars worth speaking of since we took over the Company's estate, if he might call it so. Yet the Expenditure and also the taxation had nearly doubled. The people ought to feel that the taxation was for their benefit; but as it was levied on the poorer classes, it was not wonderful that they should doubt whether the Government of India was altogether to their advantage. They had forgotten the tyranny of their old Sovereigns; they had forgotten the Mussulman domination; they had forgotten the paltry tyranny of the Rajahs; and they thought the present Government was not so advantageous to them as it might be. They came there to-night in very small numbers—he believed only nine Members were present at Prayers; and at almost any moment it would have been easy to count out the House; yet the subject they had to discuss was a most important one—the Budget of India amounting to some £50,000,000. Was it surprising if discontent existed? Some people talked of danger to India; yet that was the moment when they attacked the Vernacular Press. That was like fastening down the safety valve, and might have led to very serious consequences.

They were told of danger to India from Russia; he had no apprehension of external danger to India. The collapse of India, if it ever occurred, would be caused by internal dangers. The people, on the whole, were loyal, but they must be well-governed. If we failed to govern them well, we should lose the only title by which we held our Empire—that the people were more happy than they would be under any other form of government.

Mr. WHITWELL was of opinion, that if the cry of "India in danger" were to be raised, the feeling of Englishmen would be aroused, and nearly every hon. Member would rush to his place; but the exceptional circumstances of that day had no doubt drawn away from that House, prompted probably by a feeling of loyalty, the greater majority of hon. Members. He could not admit that the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had been, as stated by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), a dangerous speech. On the contrary, it was likely to be productive of great good. They had come to a time when it was necessary for Members to speak out their minds. India spent more than she received; hence the difficulty of her position. He was glad, therefore, to hear the Under Secretary of State declare that an equilibrium must be established, and he should not be satisfied till a surplus of £500,000 had been obtained. The hon. Gentleman had shown his usual zeal and ability in the office he had so recently undertaken; and he hoped his Administration would be successful in diminishing expenditure and avoiding increased taxation in India. He (Mr. Whitwell) believed that during the past Session the wrong policy had been adopted, and that it was a mistake to incur such a large expenditure on the military power of India.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I do not wish to enter into the questions of Indian Expenditure or Revenue; but I think it necessary, after what has fallen from several hon. Members, to say a word with regard to the circumstances of the discussion of the Indian Budget to-day. It seems to me that if some of the statements made by hon. Members go forth unchallenged. it would imply that there has been some lack of interest on Indian financial questions, not only on the part of hon. Members of the House not present to-day, but on the part of the Government in fixing this day for the discussion. In the first place, I would say that this sort of complaint, that the Indian Budget attracts but a small House, is by no means a new one, and it has been made year after year for the last 10 or 15 years, as I can personally attest; so that whenever you fix the date, whether there is a Naval Review or not, it is extremely improbable that there would be a large attendance of hon. Members in the House. However much that may be lamented, I am not at all sure that a large attendance of hon. Members on these nights is necessarily to be desired; though, of course, anyone would always be glad if hon. Members were present when all-important questions are discussed. The discussion of the Indian Budget is always conducted by those who have paid attention to and understand the intricate questions it involves, and is generally, as I am sure it has been to-night, of a very useful character. I do not know that the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney would have been more or less influential if there had been a somewhat larger attendance of hon. Members; but it ought not go forth to the world that there is any indifference at the present time to the condition of the Indian Empire, because what has happened to-night has often happened, even when the Budget has been brought forward at an earlier period by some weeks. The truth is, that upon these occasions, we know quite well that there is nothing to be substantially decided. It is not like the question of the English Budget, when we have to decide whether a particular policy shall or shall not be accepted. But it is an occasion when explanations are given and matters discussed which have their influence upon the public and the Government, and which are extremely useful in India itself. I do not believe that there is an indifference to Indian subjects in this House. No one can deny that England has very high and important interests in India, and upon questions such as these there is some cause for political danger. I think there is the keenest anxiety on the part of the country and the Government to come forward and say and do that which will tend to the security of our Indian Empire. Undoubtedly, the real and important matter is the internal administration of that Empire, and the proper administration of its finances. The hon. Member for Hackney, in the speeches he has delivered on previous occasions—and never more markedly than in his speech to-night—has done good service in calling attention to matters which are apt to be put aside as dry and uninteresting, but which really lay at the bottom of our prosperity. I do not wish to enter into any controversy with him, for my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India will answer any questions. But we ought to keep in mind the fact, that if England administers a distant Empire like India, there is no doubt that the duty of England to that Dependency is to do what she can to civilize and develope its resources and administer the country's affairs well. The more attention is directed to Indian affairs in this country, the greater pressure will be brought upon the Government of India to do everything that is possible in the interests of the people. There is, however, an unfortunate circumstance, and that is, that the Government must be expensive. The Government of such a country as Great Britain must be much more expensive in character than a semi-civilized Power. We are called upon to do great things—to develope the resources of India; to improve its communication and its irrigation works; to stave off famine; to improve education; and do many other excellent things, and at the same time to keep a strict eye on its financial system. It is difficult to reconcile these objects; but I believe the Government of India, though it may have made mistakes here and there, has, on the whole, sedulously set itself to try as far as it could to develope the resources of India, and to maintain a fairly economical Administration. It is well to be warned against engaging too largely in public works. I have always had a great jealousy of that; and to a certain extent, when I was connected with the India Office, I took a rather re-actionary course, not liking to spend money without seeing how it was to be made productive. But the difficulties to be encountered are enormous; and though it is well that we should be warned, it is not right that if these difficulties lead us into complications we should be accused of want of interest in India if we do not exactly hit on the best way of solving the problem.

Mr. JACOB BRIGHT said, he did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been successful in showing that there was nothing objectionable in putting the Indian Budget down in the last week of the Session. No doubt, it was the common practice to take the Indian Budget very late in the Session. He remembered that during the last Government the same complaint was made. He thought this complaint had some solid grounds, for everyone must feel that such a course was productive of evil, and evil only. It would not surprise him in the least if the Vernacular Press of India were to bring the charge against the Government of doing all they could to stifle discussion as to Indian affairs. The course they had taken in regard to the Indian Budget would give ground for such a charge. What was wanted, as he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would admit, was a sound and intelligent public opinion in the country and in the House upon Indian affairs, so that the Government might be strengthened in making the great changes which no one could deny were necessary in Indian administration. He thought the Government could do a great deal to increase the interest in the Indian Budget. They had to deal with a large Revenue and a large Expenditure, not far short of the amount which formed the English Budget 30 years ago. The future of India must depend upon the way they dealt with the finances of India more than upon any other thing. He looked upon India as a country with a heavy taxation, and an amount of poverty which was appalling to reflect on. It was a country with a lavish expenditure, and with finances of such a character that an unlooked-for accident might put them into a state of embarrassment. These conditions had been enough to ruin Empires, and if such conditions existed with regard to India, nobody could doubt that that Empire might be threatened with excessive danger. It appeared to him that the spending Departments overpowered the Government. He did not suppose that since 1874 the Expenditure of India had increased in the same ratio as that of England, for since that period its increase had been altogether unlooked-for in England. But previous to 1874, for a number of years, the Expenditure of India had been increasing in a larger ratio than the Expenditure of England. That, if true, was sufficient to create uneasiness. They had a country with a Revenue which grew very slowly. They had famine of the most horrible character. It had been admitted by the Government that in Southern India something like 1,500,000 persons had died from the effects of famine in one year. What was the condition of those left alive? It appeared to him that the Government of India might learn more from the way the finances were administered in this country than appeared to be the case. They had had during the last 10 years two remarkable financial policies before the world, one being a direct contrast to the other. In the year 1868 they had a Government which undertook to check expenditure everywhere, and which in some Departments greatly diminished expenditure. Revenue grew at its ordinary pace, and the Government was enabled to remit taxation, and to do good to the whole country. At the end of its career it left £5,000,000, by which they got rid of the tax on one of the chief articles of food. In 1874, the new policy was inaugurated. They had increased expenditure, no remission of taxation, and no relief of commerce, and they were considerably in debt. It appeared to him that the Indian Government had chosen to follow the last and the worst of these examples. It was for the Indian Government to do what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had done, and check and reduce taxation as the Revenue increased. He admitted that the policy recommended by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) required a Government of high moral qualities; it required patience and courage. They must be willing to sustain unscrupulous attacks. It was not altogether an attractive policy. It would not collect unreflecting crowds in the City of London, nor would it command the adulation of a servile Press. But it would tend to make a great Empire more secure, and it would relieve human suffering. It appeared to him that the Government had, during the last two years, spent a large part of its time in fostering the delusion that India was in danger from Russia. It was the opinion of many who had spoken that night that there were greater dangers to India than any which could come from the Government of St. Petersburgh. The Government that should do anything in even a moderate degree to remove the causes of famine, to control expenditure, and wisely to direct the finances of India, would do more for the security of India than anything that could come from taking an unprofitable Island in the Mediterranean or entering into an Anglo-Turkish Convention. It was owing to the mismanagement of the finances of India that we had in that country import duties which pressed on the manufacturing industry of England when it was suffering great depression. The Under Secretary of State for India had referred to the fact that the Government had reduced the duties on coarse cotton yarns. But the Government had in this surrendered nothing, for they got nothing in the way of Revenue out of these articles. Nor had they given anything to the English manufacturing districts which had already lost the trade in these articles. What the people of Lancashire wanted was to have the duties removed from goods and yarn in which there was an extensive trade between England and India. The hon. Member for Hackney was persuaded that these duties would not be reduced without the reduction of expenditure. But if that was so, then if the Lancashire Members on the other side of the House never voted for anything that would lead to a reduction of expenditure, it seemed to him that they were taking an irrational course in the matter. The Government had given fair, but utterly deceptive, promises of reducing the duties on cotton goods. For if the Government did not take the slightest care to reduce the Indian Expenditure, these promises could only be regarded as illusory; and the next time a Lancashire deputation waited on the Government with respect to the reduction of the cotton duties, their first inquiry ought to be—When was the Expenditure to be reduced? He did not think that any Government could maintain duties contrary to the principles of Free Trade, and which depressed the manufactures of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire, if the finances of India were in a sound condition.

Mr. CHARLEY thought it was ungracious on the part of the hon. Member who had just sat down to address the Government in the manner in which he had done, when they had made a concession, which was certainly a step in the right direction—namely, the abolition of the duties upon imports to India of coarse cotton yarns and coarse cotton goods to the amount of £25,681, which must have a good effect; and he hoped they would go further, and have the duties taken off the finer goods, which were at present over-weighted. On behalf of the constituency which he represented he thanked the Government for what they had done.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER had heard it said that that House took little interest in the affairs of India; but he must deny the accuracy of that statement. The people of England and the Members of that House took a deep and growing interest in Indian affairs; and with regard to the Indian Financial Statement, no doubt, if they voted the particular items, they would find that there would be just as animated discussions on the Indian Budget as there were on the items of the Budget for England. People in talking of India, spoke of it, not as they might speak of Europe, but as they might speak of Middlesex. They forgot its vastness. It was impossible for more than a few Members of the House to appreciate the details of Indian administration; and it was, therefore, natural that there should appear to be a want of interest in them. Indeed, it would be worse for India if the House attempted to deal with them; but he protested against the conclusion that there was any lack of interest in the affairs of India when the House felt that by attending to them it could do anything to promote the welfare of that Dependency. On the whole, the government of India by a Secretary of State was satisfactory.

MR. HAYTER referred to the great increase in military expenditure. In India the charge for the Army in 1876-7 was £15,792,000, and for 1878-9 it amounted to £17,000,000—an increase in three years of £1,208,000. For the Home Army the charge which was in 1873-4 £13,203,000, was for 1878-9 £14,963,000—an increase in three years of £1,760,000, making a total increase for both Forces of £2,968,000. He could not help thinking that the military expenditure of India was very large in proportion to its total expenditure; and that the proportions of European to Native soldiers might be reduced, in consequence of the growth of railways, below the proportions laid down immediately after the Mutiny. The Under Secretary for India had stated that the whole of the railway system of that country had grown up since the year 1853; in any future struggle, therefore, the troops would not be conveyed, as in Sir Henry Havelock's advance upon Cawnpore by steamer, or compelled to march, but would be brought by railway to the desired point with much more speed and facility. He would venture to allude also to the inordinate time taken in settling the claims between the Indian and the Home Governments; for the House had only just received an Estimate, or statement of outlay, amounting to £20,000, in connection with the Abyssinian War, which occurred 10 years ago. The Indian authorities must be responsible for this delay, for it was inconceivable that it could rest with officials in England. Hitherto India had borne the cost of the soldiers that were sent out from this country, as well as the cost of the Native Army; and although it might be fair to use Indian troops in the Mauritius or Ceylon, or anywhere within reasonable distance, the distribution of the charges between this country and India ought to be revised if they were going to use Indian troops, as they had lately done, by bringing them to a Mediterranean garrison.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL desired to concur in the compliments that had been paid to the Under Secretary of State for India for the clearness of his Statement, and also for the general fairness of the views he had expressed. Although, no doubt, that Statement was somewhat coloured, both sides of the House must have been extremely gratified to hear it. It was with extreme satisfaction that he had learned that the Government had been induced to abandon the proposed increase of the salt duties. With regard to the Inland Customs salt line, while unable to take the view that it was equally necessary to do away with it in every part of India, he should be glad if this reform, which was not of a financial, but of an administrative character, were carried out. He regretted, however, that such a man as Lord

Northbrook should have committed himself to the view that there should be an increase of the salt tax; and was inclined to think that in this matter Lord Northbrook had somewhat fallen under the influence of the upper classes in Bengal, who had been continually raising the cry that if fresh taxation was to be imposed, it should be put on salt, and who did not suffer from the tax themselves, as it did not fall on the rich, but on the poor. Those people of Bengal were an extremely limited class, and their view was a selfish one. They were advocating their own interests, and not the interests of the people of India at large. He was also inclined to think that there was considerable truth in the statements which had been made as to the injustice done to the people of Madras and Bombay in the matter of the incidence of the salt tax, which pressed upon the poor people of those Provinces heavily as compared with the rich people of Bengal, who were the most lightly taxed people in the world. The total taxation had not been increased, nor was it proposed to make any increase, as far as he knew, upon the present expenditure and consequent impost. If we exercised a despotic control, and could substitute for our present civilizing system of government one of a rough-and-ready character, we might, by cutting down the salaries of our officers, and by abolishing our civilizing agencies, materially reduce our expenditure; but as that was a course which Parliament would not sanction, the only way to place the finances of the country upon a satisfactory footing was by raising a larger Revenue. He was glad, however, the Under Secretary of State had not taken that extremely sanguine view which others had done, when we used to be told that if this, that, or the other thing had been excluded, we should have had a surplus. The result, however, was, that we were continually adding to the Debt. He did not see, therefore, that there was any opportunity of reducing taxation, or of abstaining from additional imposts. With respect to public works, some of them had been removed from the ordinary to the extraordinary class, and hence there was a saving; but it was not a real saving, but only an apparent and fallacious one. Here he had to complain of Government having neglected to create a Sinking Fund to pay for the execution of those works. He agreed with the Under Secretary of State that it was necessary to make permanent provision for meeting famines; but regretted that a Special Famine Fund had not been created, and that the Fund had been mixed up with the ordinary public Revenue. It was quite right that there should be an Inquiry as to how famines should be met; but he was not satisfied with the measures taken by the Government for that end. After the Orissa Famine, a Commission, of which he was the head, was appointed to inquire into the subject. They inquired and submitted certain recommendations, which, however, were not acted upon. Subsequently, a Famine occurred in Bengal, with which it became his duty to deal. He visited the scene of the Famine, and laid down the principles on which action was to be taken. They were accepted by the Government of India, and were carried into operation. It was true, before he left India, he expressed an opinion that the Famine might have been met with less expenditure; but whatever error was committed was an error on the side of mercy and the saving of life. The result was that life was saved, and Bengal was now as prosperous as ever it had been. The recent Famine in Madras fell into the hands of those who thought that the principles followed in Bengal were wrong; and, instead of feeding the people at their homes, they required them to go long distances to public works, not only in the beginning, but the end of the Famine. The consequence was, that a great addition had been made to the Debt, and there had been an enormous mortality. He was surprised to hear the figures of the mortality given by the Under Secretary of State, for he thought it impossible to ascertain them. A large part of the duty of the Commission would be to decide which principle of dealing with famines was right and which wrong. There was an universal expression of opinion in the Indian Press that the Commission of Inquiry was audaciously packed; and, with the exception of Mr. Caird, who had not yet gone out, he agreed that that was the case. And not only was the Commission not fairly constituted, but the commencement of their proceedings had been most extraordinary. One would have thought that the first thing would have been to proceed to ascertain the facts in the Famine districts; but, instead of that, the Commission had gone to Simla to enjoy for six months the luxuries of that Indian Capua. As to the Indian Army, he did not think its numbers could be safely diminished; and though some saving might be effected by reducing the pay of the officers, much could not be done in that way. He thought we should look to the North of India as a recruiting ground to supply the deficiency of our Army at home. There was no doubt that the expense of filling our European Army was increasing day by day. Trade was abnormally and extraordinarily bad, and people were driven into the Army. He did not know whether trade would revive in this country; but if ever there should be a great revival, the number of hands in this country was not so great that we could supply that trade and the Army, and there would be extreme difficulty in supplying the wants of our Army. We might look then to the North of India as a recruiting ground. If we found our way to Indian troops relieving our overworked troops in other parts of the world—if Indian troops were employed permanently by this country, no doubt that employment would be charged as our European troops were to England. Some people apprehended that there would be a collision with the Russians on our North-Western frontier. He was very much afraid that there were symptoms of difficulties of that kind which might lead to considerable disturbance and an increase of expense in India. He feared there might be something in the reports which had come from Russia and elsewhere, that Russia was pressing forward in Central Asia; and though this seemed an unlikely time for Russia to make such a movement—for she could not but be more or less exhausted—it would appear that since England had succeeded in checking Russia in one direction, Russia was inclined to worry us in another. It was not only from Russia and Central Asia that those reports were received; but within the last few days, apparently circumstantial accounts had come from India itself. We had the announcement made that not only was a Russian Embassy being sent to Cabul, but that a Lieutenant General of high military distinction, with a large cavalcade, was also going thither as representing England. He hoped that the Under Secretary of State for India would be able to tell the House whether there was really any truth in these reports. His own opinion was that a line not of absolute demarcation, but of political influence, should be drawn between Russia and England, and that it should be an understanding between them such as was so frequently come to by the masters of hounds—that one should hunt in one county and the other hunt in another. He understood the Russian Government were perfectly willing to have made an arrangement that the Oxus should be established as the boundary of Russia, beyond which she would not attempt to go. He regretted that this arrangement had not been adopted; and thought that instead of our going to the Ameer, we should have waited until he asked for our assistance. The same observation applied to the Protectorate of Asia Minor. He approved of the Salisbury-Schouvaloff arrangement, by which the political protection of Asia Minor was to be transferred from Russia to this country; but he thought, as with Afghanistan, that it would have been much better if we had waited until the Sultan applied to us for aid instead of going to him. Believing that it was totally unnecessary that we should bind ourselves to the defence of Turkey in Asia, still on general grounds, and for the sake of humanity, it was most desirable that we should do all in our power to make Turkey in Asia a strong and independent Power. He was very desirous, having had much to do with Mohammedans, that fair play should be given them to civilize themselves and render themselves independent. Returning to the question of Indian finance and taxation, he thought they should of all things avoid all expenditure and taxation that could possibly be avoided; but, on the other hand, they should not go to the other extreme of excessive timidity and fear to raise that amount of taxation which might be necessary for the government of the people. He believed that, on the whole, the people of India were lightly taxed. He believed the taxation lately imposed by the Government of India was really necessary. His only regret was that it had been imposed in an unfair way, the burden being placed on the poor instead of the rich, who were the lightest taxed people in the world. Lord Mayo had been unfairly quoted as being wholly on the side of non-taxation. Lord Mayo was one of the justest and soundest Governors General that India had ever had. It was his duty to impose fresh taxation, and he did not shrink from the task; but he imposed it fairly. He was a man who could see both sides of the question; and when afterwards it became a question of imposing other fresh taxes or of reducing expenditure, he did use the words quoted—that an addition to the taxation of India was a great political evil and danger. With regard to the mode of raising money by loan, he thought that the present system of tender in European fashion had not been successful. It led, in fact, to excessive jobbery. He ventured to urge upon the Government whether it would not be better to raise these loans by appealing to the people at large, as was done in France, where there was an immense number of small funded holders, and this operation would give them an interest in the stability of the Government. With regard to this peculiar Loan raised in India in rupees, and paid in England in gold, he did not think the explanation of the Under Secretary of State satisfactory. It was a mere dodge, an evasion of the promise under which it was understood that no fresh loan should be raised. Practically, he should have preferred a more simple, direct, and honest method.

Mr. E. STANHOPE, in reply, thanked the House for the very kind manner in which his statement had been received. He would especially thank the hon. Member who had just sat down for the support he had given to some portions of it, which was especially valuable from his great experience. He was rather surprised at some of the statements of the hon. Member for Hackney, and he hoped his account of matters would not be accepted by the House. In the first place, he did not seem to make any allowance for the actual fact that they had an avowed surplus of £2,000,000, upon which the only substantial criticism had been that of Lord Northbrook, and he represented that they had already a surplus of equal amount. But the hon. Member for Hackney said it was not a real surplus. It was produced only by adding certain items of account. But they were added to the expenditure side also. The real fact was that some 20 years ago the Government of India used to present the net Revenue and the net Expenditure; but it was said the accounts should approximate to the form adopted in England, and the result was, the Indian accounts were now made out to approximate to the form of accounts in England. And when the hon. Member for Swansea asked what was the available Revenue of India, he would ask, in reply, what was the available Revenue of England? The fact was, a very little study of the accounts in either case would enable anyone to find what the available Revenue was. The most important part of the additions to the accounts was that relating to the productive public works, and that, he thought, would be a substantial advantage. The hon. Member for Hackney had discussed the question whether it was advisable to execute public works in India with borrowed money, and he had said that it was decidedly not desirable to do so, and that if such works were undertaken at all, they ought to be executed out of a surplus of Revenue. But that was a matter which he would not discuss in anticipation of the Report of the Committee specially appointed to consider it. But he quite agreed with some of the remarks made by the hon. Gentleman as to the inconvenience of the term "extraordinary public works." A more convenient term had now been adopted, and it was the intention of the Government of India, barring some particular cases to which he had previously referred, to devote the money they applied to such purposes only to works which would really be reproductive; so that when they borrowed money for reproductive works, those works would, in all likelihood, yield such a return as would pay the interest upon the sum borrowed. If that were carried out, the result would not be an unsatisfactory one to the finances of India. A good deal had been said about the increase of the Debt. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member opposite (General Sir George Balfour), that it was desirable to give the particulars of that Debt with every possible clearness of detail. But it was a little bit hard that one of the Returns which the hon. and gallant Member had criticized that night was one which was produced in consequence of a clause that had been put into the Act of last year at his own instance. He would now give the House one statement about the Indian Debt. About the time of the Mutiny the Debt was £52,000,000. The increase in the next few years, attributable almost entirely to charges arising out of that event, was £46,000,000, and from that time up to the end of last year the increase was only £36,000,000, and £30,000,000 of that had been invested in productive public works, from which they might expect, before long, to have some considerable return. Then the hon. Member for Hackney complained that, besides imposing additional general taxation, they were increasing the burdens of the people by local taxation; and he alluded to the scheme of decentralization as likely to have that effect. Now, the fact was that the scheme of decentralization had produced to the Imperial Revenue, or would in the present year produce, something like £700,000 more than they had before, without any addition whatever to local taxation. He now came to the Military charges. If the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Mr. Hayter) looked at the accounts of military receipts, he would find that the annual net charge for the Army was not much more than £15,000,000. Moreover, as he had already explained in his opening statement, in the present year the Military Expenditure was reduced by £630,000. That was a very substantial result, and one which ought in some degree to disarm criticism. He did not think that anyone, except, perhaps, the hon. Member for Hackney, had suggested in what way the Expenditure for the Army could be much reduced. But the hon. Member had adverted to the policy they had adopted in bringing Indian troops to Europe, and to the question whether the Imperial Exchequer should not contribute to a greater extent than it now did to the expenses of the Indian Army. Well, while that policy was pursued upon a small scale only, the answer was easy. Undoubtedly, the step that had been taken had effected a considerable saving to the Indian Exchequer, and as to saying that what they had done obliged the Indian Government to keep up a larger force than they otherwise would do, that was not at all the fact. It had been admitted over and over again, and by no one more than by the right hon. Member for Greenwich, that in India they must always have a surplus Force of moderate extent available for general service. At the same time, if they were to adopt the system of employing Native troops on a large scale, it might possibly become necessary to give some consideration to the question as to how far the Imperial Exchequer ought to contribute. But when the hon. Gentleman said they required more safeguards, he would like to ask him what safeguards he meant, for the hon. Gentleman had suggested none. Of course, their main object ought to be, and it would be, to reduce expenditure, and, if possible, to reduce the Military charges; and he thought the House had as full a guarantee for that as it could have in the fact that his noble Friend who now presided over the India Office was intimately acquainted with all the details of military organization, and when he came to apply his mind to the subject, he would be able to judge for himself how far that reduction could be wisely carried. But if they could not reduce expenditure, they must endeavour to put the people in a better position for enduring taxation. If they could devise a judicious system of public works which would develop the resources of the country, and only executed such works as were likely to prove remunerative, they would be placing the population of India in a better condition to bear their taxation. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had mentioned the subject of the salt duty, and had asked for further information as to the effect of the arrangement in regard to the Native States. Now, speaking on the authority of a telegram which had been received, he could say that the Government of India were firmly persuaded that the arrangement which had been made on that matter was a just and fair one, and one which would entail no hardship on the people of the Native States. With respect to the estimate of the Famine mortality, he could only give the figures he had mentioned in his previous statement, which had been prepared in the India Office, and for which they were solely responsible. He would not longer occupy the attention of the House.

Mr. HAYTER wished to explain that Sir John Strachey was his authority for the alleged increase in the expense of the Indian Army.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Raikes.)

CENTRAL ASIA—REPORTED RUSSIAN ADVANCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, that since Supply had been closed, two or three matters had been suddenly brought to their notice upon which it was very important that information should be given to the country before Parliament separated. Within the last few days interrogatories on the subject had been addressed to Ministers, to which very unsatisfactory replies, or no replies at all, had been received. The hon. Member for the Eastern Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison) put a Question the other day with regard to the reported advance of the Russians in Central Asia, to which no reply at all was given; and a further Question, which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) addressed to the Government on the same subject the previous day received a reply almost equally unsatisfactory. There were many of them who thought that matters in Central Asia might have continued to slumber for many years, had it not been for the manner in which the clandestine Convention entered into with Turkey had suddenly aroused feeling in Russia with regard to this country. But whatever might be the cause of the sudden activity displayed by Russia in Central Asia, there could be no doubt that there had been a movement in that quarter which was of quite a different nature to anything that had taken place for the last 10 years. In 1869, 1870, and 1873, negotiations were conducted with Russia, and it was agreed to form a neutral zone between the Dominions of England and Russia in Central Asia, that neutral zone being Afghanistan. A difference of opinion afterwards arose between the two countries as to what the boundaries of Afghanistan should be, but that difficulty was ultimately resolved. There was an agreement that no other country should seek to establish a predominating influence in Afghanistan, and that that territory should not be a country in which Russia and England should intrigue against each other, and try to get the mastery. That was the understanding; and he wished it to be explained how it was that Sir Neville Chamberlain, accompanied by a large staff of officers and a whole regiment of Lancers, was about to be sent to Afghanistan on a mission—a mission of such a character being very likely, in such a country, to lead to disturbances similar to those of 1840, if not, indeed, to a war with Russia. The Session ought not to end without some definite statement being made by the Government as to whether the facts brought before them by the papers were true or not. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made an important speech in that House on this subject, in which, referring to the debate that had taken place, he said it had been eminently satisfactory, as there had been no advocacy of a policy of annexation, or of extending the British Dominions, or of a policy of advance, in order to meet Russia midway. He spoke of feeling in favour of keeping within our own frontiers, rather than attempting to go into the country of Afghanistan. He also referred to the danger of creating suspicion in the mind of Afghanistan, and said the feeling of Englishmen of all parties was that we should keep free from the imbroglio of Afghan policy. These were distinct words used in 1869, and he should be glad to hear the circumstances which had led them to depart from that policy, if it was true that Sir Neville Chamberlain, with a regiment of Lancers, was to be sent to Cabul. There had been rumours, founded on articles which had appeared in the Russian papers, stating that an advance had taken place. An advance had, in fact, taken place in two directions; one, probably, in the direction of Merv, and the other across the Oxus, in the direction of the Province of Wakhan. In 1869, it was stated on the part of the British Government, that Wakhan was a portion of Afghanistan. Lord Clarendon, again, in 1872, addressed a despatch to the Russian Government, in which he spoke of it as being a portion of Afghanistan. Earl Granville, in 1873, made a similar statement. They had no official record of the fact that Russia accepted that view; but they found from Hansard that in 1873 both the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. Grant Duff) stated in debate that the Russian Government admitted our information to be better than theirs, and agreed to accept our view. The House ought not to be left without distinct information on the subject before it separated. He also desired to ask the Government what information it could give as to Greece and the new frontier, which the Marquess of Salisbury had stated would be reasonable and moderate? He would remind the House that the word used in the Protocol was the French word inviter, which was a much stronger term than the word "invite," by which it had been translated, and it had been thus supposed that the Porte had been merely invited, or recommended, to rectify the Greek frontier, which it had evinced a great indisposition to do. The House could not afford to wait in such a matter, as it was probable that a Memorandum would not be officially communicated by the Porte to the Government until after Parliament had risen. If the Porte had not communicated its views to our Government, it had not been sparing in its communications to other persons. Many persons in Constantinople had seen a Memorandum expressing its views. He himself had heard of it by telegram, and our own newspapers gave hon. Members sufficient grounds for asking the Government what they knew about this subject. If they had received this Memorandum, or a telegraphic summary of its contents, the House ought to have it. If they had not received it, he feared it must have been purposely kept back with the view of the Parliamentary Session being closed before the Memorandum was communicated to the Powers. He would not go back upon the consideration of how far we pledged ourselves to Greece last year, but we did so as far as France did; and he should be sorry, indeed, if this country should stand behind France or Italy in connection with the carrying out of the arrangements made by the Congress. The Prime Minister had used words in alluding to this subject which were inconsistent with the Protocols of the Congress. He spoke of what the Congress did as being a mere recommendation to the Porte to rectify the frontiers and increase the territory of Greece; but it was more than a recommendation. It amounted to a direction on the part of the Powers. It was of vital importance that the small concessions made in the Protocols to Greece should be carried out; and he asked the Government, before the Session came to an end, to put the House in possession of all the information they had in their own hands. There was no doubt that difficulties had arisen in carrying out the settlement which this country had sanctioned with regard to Bosnia and Herzegovina, and also with regard to Batoum; but these were difficulties which might have been foreseen. The difficulties which had arisen in Central Asia were of great consequence to Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BOURKE said, that, though the hon. Baronet was quite within his right in bringing forward a question of this kind at this stage of the Appropriation Bill, it was not a very convenient course, because it placed the person who had to answer in this position—that he was obliged to make the best reply he could, without having the Papers before him, and without having known the questions which were to be brought before the House. The first question of the hon. Baronet—that relating to Afghanistan—related to a subject which was perhaps one of the most delicate that could be brought before the House. The hon. Baronet had alluded to the fact that some years ago an agreement was discussed between the Governments of Russia and England with regard to a neutral zone to divide the Russian possessions from India. The agreement with regard to the neutral zone never came to any satisfactory termination. He was speaking from memory, and, therefore, he hoped the House would excuse him if he did not give exactly the details of the negotiations. But, as well as he recollected, those negotiations broke down upon the question whether Afghanistan should be included in the neutral zone or not. In the negotiations it was distinctly stated that England could not agree that Afghanistan should be included in the projected neutral zone. Upon that question the whole country was perfectly united. No doubt, it would never have suited the policy of England that Afghanistan should be treated as part of the neutral zone which would separate India from Russia. Her Majesty's Government had never disguised for a moment that we had interests with regard to Afghanistan which we could not allow a foreign Power to tamper with, and that was the great reason why the negotiations with regard to the neutral zone never assumed any definite form; he apprehended that these reasons held good at the present time just as much as they did then, and we should object now as much as we did then to any interference with Afghanistan, and even more to Afghanistan being considered as part of a neutral zone. With regard to what the hon. Baronet had said as to Wakhan, he perfectly agreed with everything the hon. Baronet had said on the subject. That was one of the topics of discussion at the time, and there could be no doubt that that Province had always been looked upon by our authorities as properly belonging to Afghanistan. Certainly, it was at the time referred to, and the misunderstandings and mistakes which arose on that subject arose out of the negotiations in reference to Mr. Forsyth's mission to St. Petersburgh, and also from the Correspondence which subsequently took place. All those doubts and difficulties, indeed, arose from the fact that a map had been sent to St. Petersburgh, which was entirely erroneously drawn by the Russian authorities in Central Asia. But when it was discovered that the boundaries of Afghanistan did really include Wakhan, that plan was abandoned by the Russian authorities, who admitted the mistake. For his own part, he had never since then seen any document which shook the opinion that Wakhan was properly included in Afghanistan. The hon. Baronet had asked what information the Government had received in reference to the late Russian movements, and alluded to the question of Russians crossing the Oxus. The hon. Baronet seemed disappointed because information was not given in answer to his Question; but the Question did not invite the information referred to. He (Mr. Bourke) certainly did answer the Question as to whether the Russians had crossed the Oxus, and stated that he had not received any information to that effect. That was certainly correct, and he did not know that he could safely give any more information on that subject. The Government did not believe that the Russians had crossed the Oxus. What they might be doing in other quarters, or where the Russian Forces were, these were questions which he did not think he could be called upon to answer now. The Government had heard that a Minister of Russia had reached Cabul; but they had no information as to what the Russian Minister had stated to the Ameer, or as to what negotiations had taken place between them. It was impossible for him to say more than that. If he were to do so, it would merely be to repeat what was mere bazaar gossip, and was not founded on any official information. It was very likely that the hon. Baronet had heard that negotiations had been opened at Cabul between the Russian Minister and the Ameer; but the Government had no official means of knowing what those negotiations were. At the same time, he was quite sure that the hon. Baronet and the House believed that Her Majesty's Government were not at all indifferent to the subject. On the contrary, he did not think that a more important subject could be brought before the House, and that made him the more cautious in speaking about it. There could be no subject connected with foreign affairs that was of more importance. Our mission to Cabul would not be of the character described by the hon. Baronet; but it was such a mission to the Ameer as the Government thought suitable to the occasion. Considering the information which had reached the hon. Baronet and the public through the Press, and which had also reached the Government through the Government of India, he had no doubt Her Majesty's Government were prepared to accept the responsibility with regard to any mission they might send at this time to Cabul. He did not think he should be justified in saying more at this time; but he might add that, considering what our interests were in Afghanistan, considering the position we had always taken with regard to it, considering the negotiations of 1869 and 1872 with regard to the agreement between Russia and England, when Russia pledged her word that Afghanistan was outside the sphere of all her interests—considering all these things, he did not think the House would believe for a moment that Her Majesty's Government could look on with indifference upon what they knew was occurring in Central Asia. This was all the House could expect him to say with regard to India. Then the hon. Baronet had referred to Greece. Her Majesty's Government had, over and over again, in unmistakable terms, declared their views on that subject. Certainly the Prime Minister had never concealed what his views were with respect to Greece. He had said, over and over again, that Greece had a future; and his advice to Greece was that if any country had a future, it could afford to wait a little time. As to the views of France on the subject, he would ask the hon. Baronet whether France or any other country stated at the Congress that it was prepared to force its views on Turkey? If any Power had been prepared to insist that Turkey should give up Thessaly and Epirus, it must have been prepared also for one of two things —either to see Turkey broken up, or to go to war. That was a position for which Europe was not prepared. The hon. Baronet had mentioned a certain Memorandum, in which, it was said, the Porte had declined to agree to the recommendations of the Congress on the subject of the Greek frontier. He (Mr. Bourke) had not seen that Memorandum, and he could not agree that it was in the Foreign Office. There was no reason to think that such a Memorandum had been issued. Whether Turkey would agree or disagree it was not for him to say, but the opinion of England had been recorded in the Protocols; and if she were called upon to mediate she would mediate in accordance with the words which had fallen from the mouth of the Premier—that if Greece had a future, it could afford to wait. He had given as much information as could be expected under the circumstances. He did not think he would be justified in saying more. The Government viewed as of the utmost importance the Russian advance in Central Asia and the mission to Cabul; and if the House were to debate the subject every day from this up to Christmas, it could not impress the Government more deeply than it was impressed at the present moment with the capital importance of the subject.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT could not say that the explanation of the hon. Gentleman was very satisfactory. He could have wished that some of the sentences of the hon. Gentleman had not been of so alarming a character. The hon. Gentleman had said upon the subject of Central Asia, that it was impossible, after the events which had occurred within the last two months, for the British Government to be indifferent to Afghanistan. He did not think that statement was one which should be made unless they had been told what those events were. He (Sir William Harcourt) had never been affected by the Central Asian scare. Two years ago, the subject had been raised by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), and he thought it had then got a wet blanket which would have put out both the fire and the smoke. He referred to the speech of the Prime Minister, in which he disclaimed the imputation of being a Russophobist, and said that there was room enough in Asia for both England and Russia. He hoped every Englishman would determine to resist any attempt on the part of Russia to attack us in our Indian Dominions. Whether or not an advance upon Afghanistan was of that character was a different question. The authority of every person who had considered the matter was opposed to our disturbing ourselves with reference to the movements of Russia in Central Asia. There was no necessity for our troubling ourselves in the least as far as that matter was concerned. With reference to the frontiers of Greece, the statement which had been made by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was not, to his mind, satisfactory. The hon. Gentleman said that possibly recommendation or mediation would be wanted in reference to that matter; but his (Sir William Harcourt's) experience in reference to this matter led him to believe that neither recommendations nor mediation were of the least use when addressed to the Ottoman Government. On no single occasion had any recommendation had the slightest effect on that Government; nor were they ever likely to have effect, unless tendered at the point of the sword. There were recommendations and mediation on the part of the Conference of Constantinople. The Conference recommended that Bosnia should be given up to Austria; but what happened? Austria had been compelled to carry out the recommendations of the great European Powers at the point of the sword. Recommendations and mediations continued to be made for two years, until Russia unsheathed the sword, and Bulgaria was emancipated by force of the fact that a Russian Army was present on Bulgarian soil. Her Majesty's Government had recommended that Bosnia and Herzegovina should be evacuated by Turkish troops in favour of Austria; but he did not know that the resistance to the entry of Austria into those countries was not encouraged by the Porte. Further, Her Majesty's Government had recommended that Batoum should be surrendered to Russia; but did anyone believe that save by the force of the sword Russia could have entered Batoum? In short, it must be known to everyone who had studied history that the Ottoman Government had never given up anything except in compliance with force. The Plenipotentiaries who were sent from this country to the Berlin Congress claimed for themselves that they had brought back peace with honour; but, as a matter of fact, there was no fighting when the Congress commenced or closed its sittings, and there had been nothing but fighting ever since.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON believed that both France and Italy had shown a willingness to enforce the recommendations of the Congress with regard to Greece, had they been backed by England. It was now understood that Turkey had sent a Memorandum to Greece to the effect that it was not intended to carry out the recommendations of the Congress; and although Her Majesty's Government denied all knowledge of such a Memorandum, there could be little doubt that the Turkish Government were only waiting for the Prorogation of Parliament to give effect to the Memorandum. The course of the Government had not been to incite Greece to oppose Turkey, but to encourage Turkey to resist and refuse the demands of Greece.

Mr. C. BECKETT-DENISON said, he was quite aware of the danger of speaking lightly on any point affecting our political relations in Central Asia. It was now known, however, that since the middle of July last, a Russian mission of considerable importance, headed by a well known General, had been established, and was now in existence in Cabul. It was also known, though not with the same accuracy, that certain military movements had also been set on foot from various parts of the Russian Empire in the East, the object of which had not been explained by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was very possible that these movements were initiated at a moment when it was important to create a diversion in Central Asia, and that Russia, availing herself of every means within her power, did not scruple to set in motion these expeditions, with a view to give England occupation in the East; and if, instead of being at peace, we were now at war with Russia, he did not think we could fairly have had much cause of complaint with the course of action which Russia had taken. The question was, whether the presence in Afghanistan of Russia since the termination of the Congress in Berlin, was a hostile or a friendly act? It might be said—and no doubt it would be said—that the delegation of a mere Political Agent, though he was a resident Minister of rank, to the Court of Afghanistan, could not be regarded in any hostile sense by this country, and that we should have no cause to complain. He was not one of those who would use harsh terms towards Russia for pressing her way in Central Asia according to her own lights; nor was he at all frightened, when he raised his voice against the stealthy approach of Russia to our own frontier, at being called Russophobist. He pushed such considerations aside as unworthy of any man who thought seriously on these matters, and who knew what he was talking about. He looked upon the matter somewhat in this light. We had seen that Russia through a long series of years had gone on, by a succession of parallels, approaching her frontier nearer and nearer to that of Afghanistan; and the question was, whether what, she was about to do was sending out, as it were, another parallel in the same direction? He had very little doubt in his own mind that the objective point of the expedition was Merv; and the sooner the House awoke from its lethargy, and realized that Russia once in Merv the next point was Arat, the better it would be for the safety of this country. Khelat was already in the hands of Russia. A Russian Minister, or Political Agent, or by whatever term he might be designated, was already in Cabul; but we had no such Agent. When he read that morning that Lieutenant-General Chamberlain was to be sent out in September, he doubted that paragraph; but he was glad, from what passed that evening, to learn that that officer was a well-known general officer, in whom this country might well have confidence. He had no doubt that the aim and object of the Ameer was now, as it was that of his Predecessor, to rub the noses of England and Russia one against the other. He hoped the English Government would not permit itself to be befooled by the Ameer, or to be frightened by anything he might say or do with Russia. What we had to do was to hold a firm front by them, not to be unduly frightened, and to accept as a matter of fact the existence of the political mission of Russia as it was at Cabul; but to let the Ameer understand that there was a point beyond which we could not allow him to trifle with our interests or to annoy us. We ought to be prepared, and now more than ever. His hon. Friend (Mr. Bourke) did not insist one syllable too much upon the gravity of the occasion; and he would say this in spite of what had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). The speeches which his hon. and learned Friend had quoted from the present Prime Minister had no reference whatever to the present state of things. The Prime Minister was speaking in those days of the emigration of Russia to Beloochistan and Bokhara, two unimportant districts, and very different, indeed, from Afghanistan. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke, he thought, somewhat too lightly and flippantly in regard to what was called the great neutral zone. He was very well aware that that arrangement never took the form of a Convention or a Treaty; but, still, there was sufficient to be found in the documents and despatches to enable them to speak with full authority on what was the understanding with Russia. The despatch dated from St. Petersburgh, March 7, 1869, from Prince Gortchakoff to Baron Brunnow, stated that there was a zone which separated the Asiatic possessions of England and Russia, and that there was a limit imposed by nature, beyond which it would not be prudent for either Power to go. Russia, Prince Gortchakoff said, felt no apprehension of the ambitious projects of England in Central Asia, and she had a right to expect the same feeling from England. Baron Brunnow was directed to congratulate Lord Clarendon on his desire to avoid a misunderstanding, and to give him the positive assurance that His Imperial Majesty looked upon Afghanistan as beyond the limits in which Russia might be called upon to exercise her influence, and that no desire for any interference with Afghanistan entered into his intentions. These words of Prince Gortchakoff were uttered at a time when there was profound peace between England and Russia; and if this new political Mission had been undertaken at a similar time, it was probable that the sentiments found in that despatch would probably have animated the whole discussion. But we could not forget that this Mission had been decided upon at a time when the relations of the two countries were in a state of extreme tension; and it was that fact, more than anything else, which gave to the present position its gravity and importance. The conclusion he had come to was that it would be better for this country to accept the residence of a Russian Minister in Afghanistan as an accomplished fact; and that, as long as possible, we should find the means of living in peace and amity with Russia in Central Asia. But, while we did this, it was well to give Russia to understand that there were certain points, which, if brought into discussion, or attempted to be seized by Russia in her own interests, would create, he was about to say, a casus belli with this country, though he was adverse to using an expression of an unfriendly nature towards Russia. He did not, however, think that the cause of peace in the future would be at all promoted by keeping our policy in our sleeves, or by leaving Russia in doubt as to those points by which we should seek to protect our own interests before all other considerations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I cannot think, Sir, that it is desirable to pursue at great length what may be called a hypothetical discussion, for, to a certain extent, any discussion of the proceedings of Russia in Central Asia at the present time must be regarded as hypothetical. The information which we have is not by any means complete, and it will be difficult to form any judgment upon it. Upon one point there is no doubt we have received information, and that is that a Russian Mission has been sent to Cabul, that it has now been there for some time, and that it is one of a character which gives it importance. Undoubtedly, the fact that such a Mission has been sent there is a matter which calls for the attention of the British Government. It has always been considered—and it was very distinctly put forward in the discussion of what has been called the neutral zone—that it would not be good policy, on the part of either Russia or England, to attempt to extend their movements into Afghanistan, and it was also said in those communications that if either party had an interest in Afghanistan it was England. I remember in one of the communications made to us by the Russian Government, it expressly stated that the Russian Government would look to England to use her influence to prevent certain troubles that might take place in Afghanistan; and, no doubt, it was always considered that England had the more special interest in that country. While for some time it has been a matter for consideration whether there should be an English Envoy at Cabul, the idea has always been discouraged, and nothing has been done in that direction; but now we hear that a Russian Mission has been sent there, I think it is a most obviously necessary step that we should send one of corresponding weight and dignity, in order that it may be seen that England has interests to look after, and that she has as much right to look after them as any other Court. It is the undoubted duty of English statesmen, and of the Indian Government, to watch what is going on in these regions; and I can assure the House that Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to their responsibilities. I do not think any good would come of a further discussion. The only information we have to give is that which has been already given; and as to the statement which has appeared in the public journals, I am not able to go into details, but I can say that the information there conveyed is substantially correct. In regard to the other question to which the hon. Baronet has drawn attention—the question of Greece—there is nothing to add to what my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has already said. We have not received any information of the character indicated, or any intimation that the Porte has refused, or intends to refuse, to give effect to the arrangements proposed at the Congress. Nobody doubts that the Porte looks with jealousy upon these arrangements; but we have not received any communication that the Porte has refused, or intends to refuse. Therefore, it is premature to discuss what may be the policy of England in the event of an occurrence which has not taken place. Undoubtedly, it is hoped that the arrangement agreed upon at the Congress will be carried into effect.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it was quite clear that they had no definite information as to what Russia was doing in Central Asia; therefore, he thought it was not well to unduly press the Government upon that point. But what disturbed him was that they had not at present been told that the Ameer had consented to receive the Mission. All they knew was that Lord Lytton had decided to press it upon the Ameer. All the Indian statesmen of experience had earnestly dissuaded Lord Lytton from that course. They had pointed out to him that the policy was dangerous under any circumstances; but that it was a still more dangerous and difficult task, without the consent, and contrary to the wishes, of the Ameer, to force this Mission upon him. It was, in fact, worse than a dangerous policy. That was the advice which had always been given by Lord Lytton's advisers; and he must say he thoroughly agreed with it. He sincerely hoped we should not be led into great complications by the attempt to force this Mission on the unwilling Ameer of Cabul. It was true that their information was at present incomplete, and that this might be only a commercial mission; but he must venture to express his extreme regret that while we were settling greater things with Russia we did not settle this comparatively small affair, and that we had not come to some amicable arrangement with Russia in regard to the frontier of Afghanistan. A great deal had been said in regard to the neutral zone between ourselves and Russia; but he always understood that that proposal ultimately took the shape of an offer from Russia that there should be a neutral zone, defined by a line to be drawn, into which the political influence of Russia or England did not extend, and that that line should be drawn at the Upper Oxus; but that, if circumstances permitted, we should be at liberty to conquer the territory South of that line. We should then have been left to do what we liked with Afghanistan. He believed a reference to the Papers would show that the only reason why that agreement was not carried out was that if that was made the line, we should bind ourselves not to attempt to protect ourselves to the North of the Oxus. At all events, he must express his earnest hope that in this question we should come to terms with Russia in regard to Afghanistan. He hoped the matter would be settled in an amicable manner, and that the Indian finances would be spared a large amount of expenditure. In regard to Greece, he would only express his entire concurrence in what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). It was idle to suppose that Turkey would take any steps in regard to Greece unless something was done to compel her to do so.

Mr. FAWCETT did not intend to continue this debate at length; but it appeared to him that the question was one of the greatest possible importance. The wisest Indian statesman among them — Lord Lawrence — had warned them most solemnly against this step which the Government had now taken without giving any notice to the House of Commons. On the present occasion, he only desired to ask the Government whether, before Lord Lytton decided to send this Military Escort to Cabul, any communication was sent to the Secretary of State; and, if so, whether it was considered and approved by him in Council?

General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR said, the gravity of this movement on the part of Russia could not be overrated, and he would earnestly warn the Government to be upon the alert. It was not that he had any fear of Russia, for he had always felt that if England put forth her power she could easily prevent Russia from aggrandizing herself in Central Asia. Indeed, he had always maintained that Russia had far more reason to dread the direct action of England's influence in Central Asia than England had of Russian aggression on the frontiers of India. These intrigues, no doubt, would stir up the many disaffected within India, and thereby cause us to increase our expenditure; but that was the extent of the Russian movements. When they saw, however, the Governor General of India sending the Chief of the Madras Army to Cabul, they ought to attach more importance to the movement than had been given that night. They were thereby attaching to the Ameer's intrigues a far greater importance than they deserved, and making this Chief to be one of power; whereas he was virtually a usurper, recognized by us and strengthened in his position, from which he would fall as soon as it was known that he was our enemy. There was one point which he desired to impress upon the Government, and that was this—it would be remembered that on a previous occasion, when there was reason to believe that Russian intrigues were being carried on in Afghanistan, the English Government were enabled, by sending Lord Durham to St. Petersburgh, to avoid any misunderstanding; and on the present occasion he would earnestly entreat Her Majesty's Government to put this question plainly to Russia—"Do you, or do you not, mean to interfere with our Indian frontier?" He thought the Government could not possibly be too careful in the steps they took to prevent Russia getting a footing in Afghanistan. The bold measure resorted to by Lord Palmerston in 1836-7, of demanding explanations from the Russian Government, at first brought out assurances of our mistake in supposing the existence of intrigues; but when evidence was given of their extensive existence, then came out the truth of orders disobeyed, and of the intriguers being recalled and disavowed. The like result would follow now, for the moment she knew that England was prepared to take prompt and decisive steps, Russia would desist from any course of conduct which could endanger our Indian Empire.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT—PETITIONS AND PRESENTMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will, next Session, lay upon the Table of this House, a Return from each Archbishop and Bishop in England and Wales :—1. Of the number of Petitions, or other formal or informal presentments, received by him, complaining of illegal practices in churches or by clergymen within his diocese, since the time of the passing of "The Public Worship Regulation Act;" 2. The name of the parish ; of the clergyman and church ; the terms, nature, and number of times of complaint in each case ; the names and descriptions of complaints ; 3. The action taken thereupon ; and, in cases where no action has been taken, whether it is owing to defects in the provisions of the Law ?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS : Sir, I have not had time to communicate with the Archbishops or Bishops since Notice of this Question was put on the Paper. I do not see any objection to the Return being granted if the materials for it are in existence. If the hon. Member will move for the Return next Session, I will in the meantime make inquiries.

POST OFFICE—SURVEYOR GENERAL'S CLERKS, EDINBURGH AND DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS asked the Postmaster General, Whether the scale of pay is not higher, and the classification better, of the clerks in the Surveyor General's branch of the General Post Office in Edinburgh than that of the clerks in the corresponding department (viz. the Secretary's office) of the General Post Office in Dublin; whether it is not a fact that the duties performed by both sets of officials are identical ; and, whether, if this is so, he intends to remedy the inequality under which the Irish section of the department is labouring, by giving the clerks in the Secretary's branch of the Dublin office the classification and rate of pay accorded in Edinburgh ?

LORD JOHN MANNERS : Sir, with reference to the first Question which has been put to me, I may reply to it generally in the affirmative. As to the other parts of the interrogatory, I have simply to say that I have no power, so far as I am personally concerned, to alter or remedy the inequality complained of; but it is my intention to call the attention of the Treasury to the subject.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MONK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is able to inform the House what truth there is in the statement that has appeared in the "Daily News," that the unhealthiness of the troops in Cyprus is assuming serious dimensions ; that out of 150 Sappers quartered near Larnaca 57 are in the hospitals ; that the 42nd Regiment has upwards of 50 sick, and that the 101st Regiment is nearly as bad ; that the Commissariat department is suffering severely from the prevalent sickness among officers and men ; and that fever, complicated with severe diarrhœa, has attacked the sailors and marines who have been employed on shore, as well as the European and Maltese servants and interpreters ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can inform the House what are the most recent accounts he has received relating to the health of the troops in Cyprus ?

COLONEL STANLEY : Sir, the latest information that I have is a telegram received two days ago from Sir Garnet Wolseley, who says—

> "There is no serious illness among the troops. Some six cases are in hospital from the mild fever of the country. The men are doing well, and are likely to be on duty soon."

I have since received other telegrams from Cyprus about other business. No reference is made in them to any special degree of sickness, and therefore I am in hopes that these cases are not so severe as some people may imagine. I do not like referring to private letters ; but I have just received by this mail a letter from Sir Garnet Wolseley, in which he says—"The health of the men continues excellent, although the heat during the day is very great in the bell tents." I have also received a medical report, and although I have not been able to go through it as carefully as I could wish, there have been apparently only two fatal cases of enteric fever. I may be allowed to ask the House to remember that there are only two conditions in which a soldier is considered with respect to health. He is either fit for every duty, or he is placed on the sick list. Therefore, even a cut finger, or a common cold, or anything which prevents him from discharging every duty, would be sufficient to put him on the sick list. That may account for the apparently large number on the sick list according to some accounts. Judging from the accounts I have received, I cannot say there is any cause for anxiety.

CENTRAL ASIA — RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN.—QUESTION.

Mr. C. BECKETT-DENISON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question which may be thought out of date after the debate which we had last night; but, as it refers to an event which may mark a new era in the history of Central Asia, I desire to put it. The Question is, Whether the Government have reason to believe that arrangements have been concluded between the Emperor of Russia and the Ameer of Affghanistan for the location of a resident Russian Minister, or Political Agent of high rank, at Câbul? In answering this Question, I trust that the Under Secretary will give to the House whatever authentic information he may possess on the subject up to the present moment.

Mr. BOURKE: Sir, I am afraid that I cannot give the House any further information upon the subject than I gave last night. I then stated that Her Majesty's Government were aware that a Russian Minister had arrived at Cabul; but that they did not know what negotiations had taken place between Russia and the Ameer, which had led to that Minister being sent there, and that we had not been informed of the nature of any negotiations which might still be going on between them.

METROPOLIS—CONDITION OF LOWER THAMES STREET.—QUESTION.

Mr. FAWCETT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the neglected and dirty condition in which Lower Thames Street has for some time past been permitted to remain; and whether, as the City Commissioners of Sewers have failed to give any attention to the repeated complaints that have been made to them on the subject, he can take any action in the matter?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, in reply to the hon. Gentleman's first Question, I must say that my attention has not been called to the condition of Lower Thames Street, except by the present inquiry. As regards the second Question, in which it is assumed that the Commissioners of Sewers have failed to give attention to complaints made to them on the subject, I have received a communication from the Commissioners in which, while it is admitted that the condition of Lower Thames Street is not all that could be desired, statements are made which go far to show that it has engaged their special and serious attention. They say that they have issued instructions to their officers to pay particular attention to this street; that the police have been requested to prevent refuse being thrown into the public road; that detectives have been employed to watch offenders, who, by their evidence, have been convicted; and that the whole street is swept twice a-day, and frequently washed and sprinkled with deodorants. It is further said that the spot most complained of is immediately opposite the Custom House, to remedy which structural alterations are required, which cannot be effected without the consent of the First Commissioner of Works. That consent, however, has been obtained. With regard to his inquiry whether I can take action in the matter, I may refer the hon. Gentleman to the 49th section of the Sanitary Act, 1866, by which it is provided that in case of neglect of duty by a nuisance authority, such as are the Commissioners of Sewers in the City of London, complaint may be made to the Secretary of State—that is, as the law now stands, to the Local Government Board—who are invested with the necessary powers of dealing with such a case.

METROPOLITAN WATER COMPANIES. QUESTION.

Mr. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can promise that the Government will, next Session, introduce a measure to deal with what he lately described as the "enormously increased charges of the Metropolitan Water Companies?"

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Sir, this is a matter of importance, and one which is connected with a very large question. I am not able at the present moment to give any positive promise on the subject; but I think the matter is one which calls for the careful consideration of the Government.

Mr. FAWCETT gave Notice that, in the event of the Government not taking any action in this matter, he should take the earliest opportunity next Session of asking the House to express its opinion in reference to it, and of moving a Resolution relating to it.

ARMY—GOOD CONDUCT MEDALS.

QUESTION.

Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why so great a time was generally allowed to elapse between the recommendation of a soldier by his Commanding Officer, for a good conduct medal and the issue of the medal to him, it in many cases not being received until after the soldier has left his regiment, whereby he is deprived of the honour and gratification of having the decoration presented to him on parade and in the presence of his comrades?

Colonel STANLEY, in reply, said, that this subject had been brought under his notice; but he was not able to give a very precise answer to the Question at the present moment. He, however, entirely agreed in the principle that a good conduct medal should, if possible, be given on parade and before a man left his regiment. The medals would be given in future on parade. They were now connected with gratuities which had to be obtained out of the public funds; and it would be necessary, when a medal was so bestowed, that it should be given without any prejudice to the gratuity which might be issued.

TURKEY—ALLEGED OUTRAGES IN THESSALY.—QUESTIONS.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information as to the truth or falsehood of a statement, contained in a letter from Volo, dated 31st July, which has appearedin the public press, to the effect that the Turks were entrenching Armyro and Damoko, in Thessaly; that seven women and children have been killed and five wounded at Vardikoussa by Turkish troops under the Caimacam of Ellassona, and the village pillaged; and that an English Commissioner had been sent to inquire into the affair; whether the Commissioner, if sent, has reported; and whether his Report will be laid on the Table?

Mr. BOURKE: Sir, I am very sorry to say that I did not see the hon. Member's Question until this morning, and the time which I have had to make all the inquiries desirable on the subject has been limited; but I have made considerable inquiries about it, and I can say that I do not find anything that can justify the statement which the hon. Member says has appeared in the public journals. With regard to the second part of the Question, which mentions an outrage by Turkish troops, I have looked through some Papers respecting a subject analogous to this. I must remind the House that this appears only to have taken place a fortnight ago, so that it is quite possible that we may not yet have received information which may eventually reach us. All I can say on the subject is that I do not find any account of an outrage of the kind mentioned by the hon. Gentleman which could justify the statement referred to in the Question. As to whether, supposing we do receive any information upon this particular alleged outrage, we should lay a Report on the subject on the Table, all I can say is that we know a great number of outrages have taken place, probably are taking place on both sides, and to present a Report on one particular outrage would be to give to the House and the country a very partial idea of what is really going on; but I do propose to lay on the Table Papers on the subject generally before the end of the Session. No doubt all the information we possess on the subject will be given in these Papers.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON: I gave Notice openly in the House yesterday of the Question I have asked.

Mr. BOURKE: I did not hear it.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON: I should now like to ask the hon. Gentleman, If it is not true that Captain Sing has been sent out as a Commissioner, and who could have sent this Commissioner if not Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. BOURKE: All I can say is that I know of no such Commissioner being sent.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Sir Matthew Ridley.)

[BILL 296.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Mr. HOPWOOD, who had given Notice that he would move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day month, said, he should not persevere in that Motion; but, at the same time, he wished to make a few observations with reference to one of the Acts it was proposed to continue by this Bill—namely, the 24 & 25 Vict. relating to the Salmon Fisheries—and the particular section to which he desired to call attention was the 31st, under which the Fisheries Inspectors held their appointments. When the Act was passed, in 1867, it provided that two Inspectors were appointed for the term of one year. At that time it was contemplated that the appointments should only be of short duration, and the object of their appointment was that early proceedings might, if necessary, be taken under the Act. The powers of the Inspectors were extremely limited. They were merely to be authorized to make Reports to the Secretary of State for the Home Department when called on so to do. At any rate, he knew of no other duty they had to perform, or of any powers they possessed. They had no power to prosecute anyone for breach of the Act, nor had they the power of coming to any determination of their own. All they could do was to bring any particular matter under the notice of the Home Secretary. If they were the only persons having charge of the fisheries and the duty of inspecting them, he should still think there ought to be something found for them to do in order to justify their appointment; but from the expiration of their first appointment, a Bill had been brought in annually continuing their appointment, without imposing any real duties upon them. In 1865, it was found that the existing powers as to the regulation of the fisheries were not sufficient; and a Bill was brought in under which certain Commissioners were appointed, and one of the Inspectors was sent about to examine the different weirs and engines for the destruction of salmon and the spawn of salmon; whereupon the Commissioners adjudicated in a number of cases, and there being power of appeal given to the Courts of Law, many of those who owned the engines complained of availed themselves of the right thus given, and sometimes judgment was given in their favour, and at others in favour of the Commissioners. That body of Commissioners was a useful body. In 1868 or 1869, a Bill was passed in which the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had a great deal to do, and under that Act bodies of local conservators were to be created in different parts of the country by means of election, wherever need for such a body existed. The result of that measure was that the supervision of the fisheries had passed into local control, and there was no need for inspection; and, as far as he could judge, there had been since then little or nothing for the Inspectors to do. The usual way in cases where it was desired that appointments should be kept up for which there was no justification, was to give the persons holding such appointments something to do under another Act, and then say that they were useful public servants. One of the Inspectors had been employed as Commissioner in connection with the Deep Sea Fisheries or the Shell Fisheries; but, whatever his duties, they were quite outside the Act under which he was appointed, and he might refuse to discharge them if he liked; consequently, to say that the Inspectors were employed in duties for which they were not appointed was no justification for the renewal of their appointment under the existing Act, but was rather like making their office a sham. If it were thought necessary to retain one Inspector, he doubted whether it could be shown that both were necessary, and he should like to ask, what were the duties that those two gentlemen had been galvanized into performing over a number of years? He had put this Question the other day, but as he had not taken the course which was generally most successful in that House—that of resorting to obstruction—he had obtained no answer. He thought he had made out a case requiring the consideration of the Treasury and the Home Office, which were both interested in keeping down expenditure, and which ought to exercise some supervision over the renewal of Acts of Parliament that were only passed for a temporary purpose, but which were afterwards allowed to sleep, as this Act had been, in order that certain appointments might be perpetuated. He hoped he should be considered as having done something that would not be without its advantage in calling attention to this matter.

Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he must apologize to the hon. and learned Member for having accidentally omitted to answer a Question on this subject which the hon. and learned Gentleman had put to him the other evening. The hon. and learned Gentleman had asked why, if these Inspectors were approved of, an Act had not been passed to make their office permanent? He (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) could only say, in answer, that the difficulties of legislation were so great as to make it very often, in the opinion of the Government, better to retain a section in a Continuance Bill than to try to carry through Parliament a Bill embodying that section. These Inspectors had done good and important service to the country, as their Reports showed; and if they had not the full power which it might be well that they should possess, they acted under the authority of the Home Secretary, and had carried out important investigations in reference to the fresh-water fisheries in Norfolk and elsewhere, and to the oyster beds, and they had also made inquiries for the Board of Trade. No one could doubt these gentlemen were doing a good work, and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was decidedly of opinion that it would be impossible, with any advantage to the country, to do away with them.

Mr. WHITWELL thought the Inspectors ought to be permanently appointed, and that the system of continuing them by this Bill gave rise to the impression that they were only appointed for a temporary purpose. He wished to bear his strong testimony to the very useful services of these Inspectors in the North-West of England.

Mr. J. COWEN desired to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the present condition of the Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections Act. The Government had embodied their suggestions and ideas on this subject in a Bill that had been put down for consideration that day; but which was only put on the Paper as a matter of form. He hoped he might be permitted to say that if the House were to take the ideas of the Government as thus formulated on this subject to be their ultimate decision, they were, in his opinion, very inadequate and incomplete, and did not cover the ground at all. He thought this matter was the more pressing owing to the near approach of a General Election, and he hoped that the Government would reconsider the whole question, and embody in the Bill a more comprehensive proposal than the one at present before the House. He would add this suggestion, which he thought was worth the consideration of the Government—namely, whether it would not be a wise step to associate with each Judge appointed to try Election Petitions two, three, or four Members of Parliament, or legal gentlemen, who might act in the capacity of assistants or assessors; the Judge being judge of the law, those who were associated with him being judges of fact? He believed that some such plan would remove the difficulty that was at present experienced in having Election Petitions settled absolutely by one Judge. This suggestion was not embodied in the proposal of the Government, and he would suggest that it should be adopted, if possible, before the next General Election. Another point to which he wished to draw the attention of the Government was the very unsatisfactory state of the law with regard to employment of cabs at Elections. They all knew that at borough Elections cabs were employed, and frequently at a very large expense. They also knew that this was an illegal system, and yet it was regularly indulged in. He had occasion recently to know something of the expenses incurred in this way in borough Elections, and he thought the Government ought to do one thing or the other—either legalize the use of cabs, or make the punishment for employing them a little more stringent.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was bound to add his testimony to the admirable way in which the Inspectors of Salmon Fisheries performed their duty. He believed it would be impossible for any Secretary of State to administer the law properly without their assistance.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses agreed to.

On the Schedule,

Mr. HOPWOOD said, he had one word to say upon the Schedule of this Bill, although he did not propose to move the Amendment upon it of which he had given Notice. Some misunderstanding appeared to exist in reference to the duties of the Fishery Inspectors, because they were not employed in any way officially with regard to the oyster fisheries. He would not say that they might not have undertaken some duties of the kind; but the oyster fisheries were not administered under this Act of Parliament. His contention was that if these gentlemen rendered any services of this kind, they rendered them gratuitously, and that this was a state of things that ought to be put an end to. If they rendered valuable services, let them be paid for those services, and not for something else which they did not do. He would not press his Amendment.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that in consequence of the passing of the Highways Bill, it had become necessary to modify the paragraph in the Schedule which continued the Locomotive Act. He therefore moved, in line 22, to insert after the words "whole Act," the customary words "as far as not repealed."

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD said, that supposing this Bill received the Royal Assent before the other, some difficulty might arise.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would undertake that the Highways Bill should receive the Royal Assent first.

Mr. J. Cowen

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, looking at the period of the Session, and considering that this Bill would have to pass through all its stages in the House of Lords, he would trust to the indulgence of the House to allow it to be considered and read a third time. If that were not done, the Session would be prolonged. He took that opportunity of stating that it was proposed that the House should meet to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

Mr. NEWDEGATE called the attention of the Government to what appeared to him to be an error in the reference made to the Statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 50, or to the 5 & 6 Will. IV.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

TURKEY—MURDER OF MR. OGLE.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON, in rising to call attention to the failure of Mr. Consul General Fawcett to ascertain the circumstances under which Mr. C. C. Ogle, the "Times" Correspondent in Thessaly, was murdered by Turkish soldiers; and to move—

> "That, in the opinion of this House, Mr. Consul General Fawcett's Report upon Mr. C. C. Ogle's death is inconclusive, and that a fresh Commission of Inquiry ought to be instituted, composed of Englishmen only, who should be specially empowered to assure the witnesses of the protection of Her Majesty's Government," said: I must say that I feel some compunction in obtruding myself upon the House at this late period of the Session, and I also feel bound to apologize to the House for the length to which, in all probability, my remarks will extend. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke) told me, when I complained on a former occasion that we had not had the Papers as soon as I thought we might have expected them, that the delay of which I complained was due to the fact that the Report extended to 62 pages in length. I am afraid that I shall be obliged to go through those 62 pages, in order to justify the Resolution which I am about to move. The Resolution calls attention to the fact of the Inquiry of Consul General Fawcett into the circumstances of Mr. Ogle's murder having failed entirely to bring out the truth; and, having proved that, I shall endeavour to show that a fresh Commission of Inquiry ought to be instituted, composed only of Englishmen, and that the Commission should be specially empowered to give the witnesses, whom it may be necessary to examine, the protection of Her Majesty's Government, and to transport them to a place of safety after giving their evidence. I believe I shall be able to prove to the satisfaction of the House that each of the points included in my Motion is a matter of absolute necessity. I regret that it has fallen to my lot to call attention to this subject, because I cannot but recognize my own inability to do justice to it, and I believe thoroughly, upon the facts of the case, that if any more experienced Member had brought it before the House, he would have succeeded in doing that which I can only hope to attain. In raising this question, I desire not only to secure justice to a murdered Englishman; not only to satisfy the just wishes of the family and friends of Mr. Ogle, who feel deeply that such attention has not been paid to this case as one would expect to be paid to the murder of an Englishman by the English Government; but I wish also to see whether a great and powerful country like our own is as able and willing to protect the lives and fortunes of its citizens, no matter where they happen to reside, under the present, as under former Governments. I have no hesitation in saying that if the murder of Mr. Ogle had occurred while Lord Palmerston was in power, it would never have been passed over in the way it has been. While that noble Lord was in Office, to say "Civis Britannicus sum" was a real amulet of protection to Her Majesty's subjects abroad. Every country, especially every barbarous and semi-barbarous country, then felt a positive certainty, arising from experience, that England, in case of the murder of even the meanest subject of the realm, would hold a full and fair investigation, and punish the guilty as surely as light follows darkness. If Her Majesty's Government allow a murder of this kind to be neglected, as I believe I shall be able to prove it has been; if they allow it to remain not only practically uninvestigated, but coloured and distorted by a prejudiced statement of facts; if they allow the guilty to remain undesignated, I think the House will agree with me that upon them will rest the very grave responsibility of rendering more insecure in the future than in the past the safety, honour, and welfare of our citizens abroad. In making this Motion, I am anxious to give them an opportunity of relieving themselves of that responsibility.

It is necessary that I should say a few words upon the character of Mr. Charles Chaloner Ogle; because I find, in reading the Report, that both his character and conduct are impugned distinctly by Sir Austen Layard, our Ambassador at Constantinople, and Consul General Fawcett, and I must therefore defend his conduct and exhibit it in a proper light. I do not mean to say that because Mr. Ogle's character was a good one he had any greater claim to justice. On the contrary, I rely on the much higher principle that even if his character had been bad, that would have been no reason why the circumstances of his death should not have been fairly tried, and justice done to the claims of his country and his relatives. But, in point of fact, Mr. Ogle's character was thoroughly estimable. No doubt he had his faults; but, to use a French expression, they were only "les défauts de ses qualités." His kindness of heart was carried almost to excess. As he once said to a friend—"He could never hear anyone ask for bread and not give it." He was a friend to the poor and the oppressed of every class or clime, and he was as kind to animals as to man. In crossing a stormy arm of the sea, on a wet, and cold, and windy day, he took off his own coat and threw it over his horse. A merchant of Volo has, I am informed, bought the horse, in order to have something to "show kindness to that was Mr. Ogle's." Strong men, refugees from Bulgarini, wept when they spoke of his death, saying that he had been more than a father to them. His last act was to protect, to conduct out of harm's way, to give money and bread to defenceless and oppressed fugitive women and children from Bulgarini. His last written word was a charitable message to a friend in Volo, written only one day before his murder, to this effect—

> "Friend, pray send these nine women and children to your warehouse, and give them food at my expense. Your friend, Charles Chaloner Ogle."

These were the last recorded words of Mr. Ogle. His character was fully recognized in Greece. Two little children of Bulgarini who, not being Greeks, had no claim upon the orphan school at Athens—an institution most difficult to obtain admission into—were placed there by favour; because, as the Committee told them, the English gentleman would have wished it. Mr. Ogle was impartial, and a man of a most sincere character. He has been represented as being an ardent Anti-Turk. Nothing can be further from the truth. He recognized, as many Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House do, the good qualities which many of the Turkish people possess. No doubt, he did notice and reprobate the evil conduct of the Turkish authorities; but he cannot, with any fairness, be described as a disliker of the Turks. With reference to the insurgents, of whom he has been accused of having been an agent, he said to Madame Zabanski—

> "It is not because I am blind to the faults of these people that I hope they will succeed, but it is because I am convinced that there is no other remedy for them. I would give them freedom as I would have a child vaccinated."

I would ask if that is the language of a spy, or of a revolutionary agent? As a newspaper correspondent, his great desire was, to use his own expression, "to be true; to be exact." He would rather be silent on a subject of the deepest interest than send an account to a newspaper which was not based on reliable information, satisfactory to himself. Of this I know a remarkable instance. At the time of the murder of the Consuls at Salonica, being asked by a lady what account he was going to telegraph, he said that he had heard so many contradictory accounts that he intended to send none at all, and this was notwithstanding the fact that other newspaper correspondents were telegraphing every piece of information that came into their possession. It is too much to be feared that the very fearlessness and truth of his character, being recognized by his enemies as well as by his friends, caused him to fall a victim to the very qualities which most distinguished him. The Times said—

> "Mr. Ogle had tracked murder and rapine and brutal lust home to the Chief of Police of Thessaly, and denounced publicly the official miscreant."

Such conduct was very likely imprudent, but it was the conduct of a brave and gallant Englishman. Are we to condone his murder on the ground of such imprudence? The politician for whom Mr. Ogle cared most in Greece, and with whom he was most intimate, was M. Tricoupi, whose name is well-known to hon. Gentlemen. M. Tricoupi always opposed the encouragement by Greece of irregular movements in Thessaly. He hoped that more would be gained by moderation, and Mr. Ogle shared in that hope. This was well known to his friends; but a perusal of these papers, without knowledge of his character, would produce a contrary impression, and might well create a groundless prejudice against him. Mr. Ogle was energetic, studious, and able. The King of Greece made him Knight Silver Cross of the Order of the Redeemer, in recognition of the thorough knowledge which he had acquired of every branch of the social and political affairs of Greece. Probably, His Majesty hoped that Mr. Ogle would make use of his knowledge in dispelling certain mistaken opinions, prevalent in some quarters of England, upon the present state of Greece, and upon the wonderfully rapid progress which that deservedly rising country has made of late years. Well, Sir, that Mr. Ogle was held in the highest esteem by all classes in Greece is proved at once by referring to the circumstances that attended his funeral. On that occasion the shops were spontaneously closed. A vast concourse of people followed him to the grave, including representatives of every class, from the President of the Council of Ministers, and other Members of the Cabinet, the members of the Holy Synod, a gentleman-in-waiting of the King, and the Mayors of Athens and Piræus, down to the pretty weeping child of 12, who, at the last moment, placed on the top of the pile of memorial wreaths of flowers that hid his coffin, one bearing the words—"The widows and orphans of Bulgarini to him who saved them." He now sleeps in death by Admiral Canaris, the veteran hero of Greek independence. His monument is to be beside Lord Byron's; and I would ask the House, is this a man whose murder England intends to allow to remain a mystery, and will she permit the miscreants who did the deed to go undetected and unpunished?

I would now allude for a moment to some of the circumstances of Mr. Ogle's visit to Thessaly. Upon this subject, as upon too many others, an inaccurate view has been put forward in the Report to which I shall presently refer. It is quite true that when the insurrection in Thessaly first broke out, Mr. Ogle crossed the frontier as The Times Correspondent; but when the Volunteers were recalled, Mr. Ogle went back to Greece. That excursion had nothing to do with his last visit to Thessaly, and ought not to be confounded with it. Some time before the troubles upon Pelion came to a climax, Mr. Ogle crossed the Gulf of Volo from Amaliopolis, upon the Greek frontier, and landed upon the quay of Volo. He landed perfectly openly. His landing was within the knowledge of the authorities, as the landing of all travellers is in a Turkish town. He lived quite openly at the house of M. Zabanski, the colporteur of the Bible Society. His status, as The Times Correspondent, was equally well known to the Turkish authorities. There was no concealment of any kind whatever as to his movements. When he wanted to go to Bulgarini, he applied directly to the Caimacam of Volo for an escort. This was not the act of a man who wanted to conceal what he was about, or of a spy. We are told, in a despatch from Sir Austen Layard, that the escort was refused him; but it will be found, on referring to page 53 of the Report, that an arrangement was made between the Caimacam of Volo and the Italian Consul to send a man with him as escort. This man was examined by the Caimacam as to what happened during Mr. Ogle's visit to Bulgarini, and Mr. Ogle went afterwards, and asked—

> "Why did you question the poor Ghega who accompanied me, when, if you had sent to me, I would willingly have told you everything I did, and everything I was going to do?"

At this time the country was not in a state of actual war, although the inhabitants of the numerous villages that clothe the sides of Pelion were in a state of fitful and irregular revolt. This assertion is corroborated by Hobart Pasha, when, on March the 19th, he interviews the village Chiefs, and reads a Proclamation, in which he states—

> "The villages in the immediate neighbourhood of Volo are, if not in actual revolt against the Government, harbouring rebels in great numbers."

And he goes on to say—

> "Before resorting to coercive measures, I wish to try what conciliation can effect."

I am not at all astonished at the state of the villages. I visited Volo last autumn, and gathered information from trustworthy persons, and I know what tyranny, what misgovernment, what outrages, and what fearful exactions had goaded these Thessalian peasants out of a chronic state of smouldering discontent into active, but desultory, resistance to the Turkish rule. At this time the road to Macrinitza and the other villages was perfectly open. The insurgents came in openly to Volo to buy not only food, but ammunition, and returned as openly to their hill-side homes. Mr. Fitzgerald, the Correspondent of The Standard, says—

> "To act the part of a spy was unnecessary, indeed, impossible. There was nothing to spy out, evade, or conceal. No more signs of war than there would be in an English county if the military were called out to quell an armed assemblage of rioters in some such place as Merthyr Tydvil."

But, if Mr. Ogle was a spy, why was he not treated as one? Why did the Turks not arrest him, and have his conduct investigated? The answer is plain. Because they knew that there was no foundation for the charge. I have been obliged to allude at length to this part of the subject, in consequence of the ex parte statements listened to by Sir Austen Layard, and relied on by Consul General Fawcett. I will now refer to some of those statements. In page 1 of the Report, there is a telegram from Sir Austen Layard to the Marquess of Salisbury, in which he states—

> "Report has come from Athens that The Times correspondent at Volo has been killed. Porte has telegraphed for information; but nothing is known of circumstances here. It was alleged that the gentleman was aiding insurgents, and strong complaints were made to me against him; he was warned of the danger he was running by going about from village to village. Hobart Pasha has written to me about his proceedings, stating that he was in communication with Athens."

Sir, there is not one word of proof of all these allegations against Mr. Ogle. I find next, in No. 7, page 5, a despatch from Mr. Layard to the Earl of Derby, with an inclosure of which the following is a translation:—

> "The following is a telegram which the Vali of Yanina addressed to the Prime Minister, dated the 6th (18th) of March, 1878:—'The Correspondent of The Times has arrived at Volo and made an application to the Italian Consul, requesting two zaptiehs and an official letter to take with him to the village of Bulgarini, in the interior of the district of Yénidge. If such a letter were given to him, the authorities would have seemed to wish to guarantee the life of the traveller in the midst of the localities infested by the Greek rebels, who had already burnt several villages which had become thereby the scene of the hostilities. To have the traveller accompanied in these places, even by several zaptiehs, would be a very dangerous proceeding. For all these reasons we have declined to comply with the request of the above-named Consulate."

But they did comply with the request, and allowed a man to accompany him, as I have already shown. There is a statement on the next page (6)—

> "This gentleman went to the insurgents of the villages, Bulgarini and Kesrick, in company of a brother of one of the insurgent Chiefs named Papa Costa, an inhabitant of Volo, native of Yénidge, and having resided at Volo for some months past. He visited the district of Yénidge, calling himself English, and a son of the Correspondent of The Times. He pretended that the insurgents were going to the district where other Greek insurgents would join him, to lay waste the locality. He said that the Ottoman troops were few in number, and gave information respecting fortified positions; adding that a considerable number of individuals, belonging to families of note in Greece as well as of students, were going either to put themselves at the head of, or to join the insurgents. That news has been communicated by the Sub-Governor of Yénidge. This gentleman is here to excite the people. Credible information goes to prove that the object of his journey is solely to foment disorders. It is hardly necessary to call the attention of your Highness to the fatal results which might be produced by such a seditious state of affairs, especially under existing circumstances. Consequently, I beg your Highness to have the goodness to take the necessary steps at the Embassy of Her Britannic Majesty, in order to obtain the removal from the country of this person, whose presence gives rise to inconvenience."

Well, afterwards, to show what the object of Mr. Ogle's journey was and how he carried it out, in No. 28, page 14, Mr. Layard informs the Marquess of Salisbury—

> "I telegraphed to Hobart Pasha, who is in command of the Turkish Squadron off the coast of Thessaly, and requested him to have inquiries made on the subject, and to inform me of the result. I instructed Consul Barker in the same sense. The Prime Minister, to whom I also spoke on the matter, at once sent the most stringent orders to the authorities at Volo to give every facility for a full investigation. I have received two telegrams from Hobart Pasha, who appears to think that Mr. Ogle was killed during the attack on Macrinitza, and that the Europeans and Greek sympathizers at Volo are endeavouring to give a very exaggerated version of the circumstances connected with the unfortunate gentleman's death. I have seen an English gentleman, well known here, who is just arrived from Volo. He states to me that Mr. Ogle had been killed as he was taking an active part with the insurgents, and was in the habit of exposing himself to great danger by going backwards and forwards between Volo and the villages occupied by them. He had been frequently warned not to do so. It was reported that during the attack on Macrinitza, he was seen in an advanced position, and that a Turkish officer, recognizing him as an Englishman, restrained his men from firing upon him."

Sir Austen Layard repeats a number of assertions in the same sense, with which I will not trouble the House. I will merely make the same comments upon them all—first, that they are not true; next, that the authority is not given; and third, that I shall be able to disprove them.

In No. 38, Mr. Layard, in a telegram to the Marquess of Salisbury, says—

> "Burrell's state of health prevents him going to Volo. Consul General Fawcett is ready to go if you consider it absolutely necessary."

Mr. Blunt, who began the inquiry, wished to leave. No doubt he found that the inquiry was not likely to turn out as satisfactory as he could have wished, and another official—Consul General Fawcett—was appointed, because he was considered a proper person to hold a judicial inquiry. When I come to the Report itself, I shall show what sort of an inquiry the Judge of the Supreme Court of Constantinople considered a judicial inquiry. Mr. Layard's directions to Consul General Fawcett are on page 38, inclosure 44—

> "I have directed Mr. Blunt by telegraph to have ready for you such evidence as may have already been taken on these subjects. I trust, therefore, that it will not be necessary for you to be long absent from your post, but that the inquiry will speedily be brought to an end. Considering the excitement that it appears to be causing, both at Volo and in Greece, it is very desirable that it should not be prolonged beyond the term absolutely necessary, in your judgment, for ascertaining the truth."

That is for concealing it. [Mr. BOURKE: Where are those words?] Those are words of my own; that is what I consider to be the result that would naturally follow haste in this matter. At page 40, No. 49, Mr. Layard wrote to the Marquess of Salisbury—

> "I have the honour to inclose in original the Report addressed to me by Her Majesty's Consul General and Judge of the Supreme Court with reference to the death of Mr. Ogle. I have not had time to have translations made of the evidence taken in Greek. Should your Lordship require such translations, I will have them made if the documents are returned to me."

In that case, of course, more delay would take place. The documents would be sent from this country to Constantinople, translated, and sent back to England. I am sorry to observe that there is not in the Correspondence between Mr. Layard and the Foreign Office a single syllable of real regret, on the part of our Ambassador, for the murder of Mr. Ogle. It was of consequence at that moment to minimize the event as much as possible. Important negotiations were going on between this country and Turkey, and if an angry feeling had been raised against Turkey the negotiations might have altogether failed. There was, therefore, a natural anxiety to hush the matter up, and I am afraid that that anxiety was gratified at the expense of justice. I do not blame anybody, but I am merely endeavouring to give an explanation of the extraordinary fact of so little attention having been paid to the murder of an Englishman in Thessaly. I have noticed that there is generally a great esprit de corps among the gentlemen of the Press; but it is a curious fact that, at almost one and the same moment, all mention of the case in certain papers which had taken an interest in it before ceased. It would almost seem as if a mot d'ordre had been sent out by someone of sufficient importance that the subject of the murder of Mr. Ogle had better be dropped, and that justice to individuals must give way to political expediency. No more letters were inserted in The Times or in The Standard, which had been very fair in the matter. I challenge an explanation of this curious fact from the papers. I only wish that the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) were present now, in order that he might say a word for his correspondent who was murdered in doing his duty so bravely.

The Blue Book teems with opinions expressed before the inquiry as to what ought to be the constitution of the desired Commission. There was a general opinion, clearly stated, that an inquiry would fail if not conducted, in the first instance, at all events, before Englishmen only, and after the safety of the lives and the property of the witnesses had been specially guaranteed by Her Majesty's Government. This is the general gist of the documents upon this branch of the subject in the Blue Book. The predictions that there would be an indisposition to give evidence, except under the specified guarantees, are justified by the fact that before the Joint Commissioners, Consul General Fawcett and Regeb Pasha, not one witness gave evidence, although plenty offered to give evidence privately and were refused. In page 2, No. 4, in a letter from Mr. Wyndham to Lord Salisbury, dated April 3rd, this statement occurs—

> "The Greek Vice Consul concludes by stating that nothing less than the presence of a Commissioner, accompanied by force, can obtain particulars, owing to the terrorism which prevails."

A similar despatch, sent by post, was received on the 13th of April, No. 22, page 12, and there is another on page 13. The next document I will refer to is on page 28, inclosure 5, No. 29, which is a mémoire upon the death of Mr. Ogle, written by Mr. Streit, Professor of National Law in the University of Athens. He states—

> "The man who had brought me the first information concerning the whereabouts of Ogle during the afternoon, evening, and night, subsequent to the battle, had started for the village. I commissioned a very respectable person at Volo to try to bring him to me; this person returned saying that the peasant in question was afraid to come to Volo, but had given him the list of the names of the people who had seen Ogle during the time mentioned; but he had made him promise not to divulge them unless an adequate English military force could insure their safety. The whole Consular body of Volo, the Correspondent of The Standard, and the Greek inhabitants of Volo are unanimously of opinion that an inquest might lead to a verification of the circumstances of the death of Ogle by eye witnesses, if (1st) Turkish authorities were excluded; (2ndly) if the presence of an English force encouraged the witnesses to depose the truth; (3rdly) if the witnesses were carried away from Volo directly after the close of the inquest."

On page 29, you will find the reply of the Consuls to Hobart Pasha, who asked them to join him in investigating the case—

> "An inquest in the presence of Turkish officials, and without the necessary guarantee of the lives and fortunes of the witnesses, in the shape of an adequate English armed force, would turn out a mockery."

Mr. Streit's mémoire concludes with these words—

> "It is considered probable that the murder was committed by order of some officer of superior rank; that it would be very difficult to obtain satisfactory proof of the latter fact; but that the murder would be easily exposed if the above-mentioned measures were resorted to. Lastly, that the Turks at Volo seem highly pleased that no demonstration of English military force has up to the present been the result of the Ogle affair."

To show how afraid people were of their names being mentioned, let me refer to page 30, No. 32, a letter, to which there is this postscript—

> "Pray take care that my name does not appear; one must be under Turkish protection to know what fear means."

I know who the writer of that letter is. He is a resident in Volo; a man whose character is above suspicion. At page 36, there is an inclosure, No. 40—

> "I have been informed that in case of inquiry, the Greeks who happen to know anything will most likely be afraid to come forward and give evidence from fear of Turkish vindictiveness."

At page 38, there is a letter from Mr. Ogle, of Sevenoaks, to the Marquess of Salisbury, which states—

> "The result of the inquiry, conducted partly under the auspices of the Commander of the Turkish Forces in Thessaly, is not likely to be the conclusion of it, and the presence of the official has effectually scared witnesses away, and has not emboldened his lieutenant, Iskender Pasha, to appear as a witness. Until a preliminary investigation is made by English officials alone, and complete provision made for the safety of witnesses during the investigation and for some time after it, England will be baffled, and those who allow her to be so will be involved in consequences which even friends must deplore. Even amidst events the most momentous, it may be wise to meet a single incident with caution in view of its possible issues."

He goes on to say, at page 39, No. 47, in a letter dated the 17th of May—

> "Personal and political bias, such as would be incompatible with personal honour and official integrity, has not been ascribed, I believe, either to Mr. Blunt or to Mr. Fawcett. But what of the personal and political bias of Regeb Pasha? He is the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Thessaly, and these are the Forces to which Mr. Ogle's assassins are supposed to belong. He himself, and his lieutenant, Iskender Pasha, have been publicly declared to be so cognizant of the subject of the inquiry, that they ought to have been called as material witnesses. He is probably the commanding officer of Major Reschid, who is distinctly denounced by John Elliott in his letter of the 8th of April (of which a copy has been forwarded to your Lordship), and is positively declared to have said to several bystanders that he would make the Correspondent Ogle's sermons cost him very dear. Such is the personal and political bias of Regeb Pasha, and so well is it known, that it has been found impossible to induce Greek and Christian witnesses to enter into his presence. Their distrust is justified by the fact, reported in to-day's journal, that three persons who had privately given information concerning the late Mr. Ogle's movements on the 29th of March last have been sent to Athens, their lives having been threatened if they return to their villages. This fact indicates also the only procedure by means of which depositions can be obtained which have been hitherto withheld."

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: At what page is that?

Mr. H. SAMUELSON: At page 8. What is the consequence of not giving effect to these recommendations in the formation of the tribunal? Why, as I said before, that no witnesses at all came before Consul General Fawcett. The Greek Consul, M. Zioti, writes to M. Delyanni at page 34, inclosure 37—

> "I am told that every possible effort is being made to form the commission charged with the investigation into Ogle's murder exclusively of persons favourable to the Turks."

A letter from Mr. Ogle to the Marquess of Salisbury, received May 7th, says—

> "Professor Streit writes (in his mémoire, at page 10) that he has seen two eye-witnesses of the murder of my son. I have telegraphed to M. Tricoupi, and he has telegraphed to me in reply that Professor Streit had addressed Consul General Fawcett in respect to these witnesses. I should have taken it as a matter of course that these witnesses would be summoned, protected effectually from Turkish officials, and examined in the first instance, at least, in presence of British officials only. But the fact is that up to a very recent date they had not been examined, and they never were."

Mr. Ogle then goes on to say—

> "Hitherto the inquiry has been conducted as if intended to screen the Turks, and I must ur> gently appeal to the Foreign Office if I care for truth and justice. All these things justify my solicitude and my distrust of the Commission as hitherto constituted. The preliminary inquiries should surely be conducted by English officials only. The Turkish witnesses are intimidated by Turkish officials; much more the witnesses who are not of the same race as those officials, and are subject to their power."

Two battles took place at Macrinitza, one on Thursday, the 28th of March, and the other on Friday, the 29th; and the assertion of Mr. Fawcett is most distinct that Mr. Ogle was murdered on the evening of the 29th, as he was returning with the insurgents from the battle of Macrinitza. Perhaps I may here quote Mr. Fawcett's statement as to the geographical position of the places I shall have occasion to mention—

> "In order to understand what follows, it is essentially necessary to have a knowledge of Volo and the neighbourhood, which I must therefore attempt to describe. Volo lies at the end of the bay of that name. Behind it, running nearly north and south, is the range of Mount Pelion, with an elevation of nearly 4,000 feet. Between the sea and the mountains there is a fertile plain about two miles and a-half wide, covered with olive and other fruit trees. Looking at the mountains behind Volo from the sea three villages are seen, the lowest or centre one being Eski or Old Volo; a little to the right, and higher up, is Portaria; to the left, perched on the steep face of the mountain, and higher up than either, is Macrinitza. This last village from top to bottom is nearly a mile long, and its streets are almost perpendicular."

I will now refer to the Report itself, at page 40, and before doing so, I should like to explain that I do not blame Her Majesty's Government for their action in this matter. If difficulties were thrown in the way of eliciting the truth, they were due, in the first instance, to the instructions which were given by Sir Austen Layard to Mr. Fawcett; and, in the second place, to a too rigid construction placed on those instructions by Mr. Fawcett. Mr. Blunt had already taken certain depositions which were submitted to Mr. Fawcett, and appended to his Report. The second Commission consisted of Mr. Fawcett, and Regeb Pasha, the commander of the Forces in Thessaly. I do not wish to impute any blame where it is not due, and I will at once give Regeb credit for his humanity. He commanded the Turkish troops at the first battle at Macrinitza, and because he spared the prisoners, and did not commit atrocities, was accused of having taken a bribe, and great dissatisfaction was expressed with him. Reschid Pasha, who commanded in the second battle of Macrinitza, carried out a very different system, and determining that he should not be accused of humanity, he treated the conquered peasants with the greatest inhumanity and cruelty. At page 40, Mr. Fawcett states—

> "I saw the Greek Consul and other persons in the place, who stated that there were individuals who could give valuable evidence as to the alleged assassination of Mr. Ogle, but also were afraid to do so lest they should be afterwards punished or maltreated by the Ottoman authorities. The Greek Consul further stated that these people required a guarantee that they would not be molested from the British Government, and also that they were prepared to give me information in private as to the matter. I informed him that I did not see how it was possible for Her Majesty's Government to give any such guarantee, and that I had no instructions to give any."

But Mr. Fawcett did not telegraph to ask if he might give such a guarantee. There is no sign in his Report that he wanted to give such a guarantee, or that he asked the permission of Her Majesty's Government to do so. I may here mention that Hobart Pasha and the Caimacam of Volo had also refused to give such a guarantee on behalf of the Turkish Government, as appears from page 17—

> "After the despatch of the English Consul's note, Hobart Pasha went to him, accompanied by the Caimacam, and proposed to have the matter of Mr. Ogle's murder inquired into by the Consular body, assisted by the Turkish authorities. Mr. Suter answered that he could not take any steps until the Turkish Government had guaranteed to the English Government the lives and goods of the witnesses. As Hobart Pasha and the Caimacam replied that they could not grant such a guarantee, the matter dropped."

There was thus a distinct refusal on the part of the Turkish authorities to give a guarantee, and a distinct refusal on the part of the English authorities. Mr. Fawcett then goes on to say—

> "For the second request, I informed him that I was officially here on a mixed Commission of English and Ottoman authorities to investigate the circumstances connected with Mr. Ogle's death, and that any information given to me privately could not form part of any Report I might make. But I told him that I would most earnestly impress on the Mutessarif at once to proclaim in the most solemn manner that all persons who could give any evidence at the coming sittings might do so in perfect safety, and that no harm should come to them."

On page 59 will be found the Proclamation, which was issued in the following words—

> "In connection with Mr. Ogle, The Times Correspondent, killed in the last battle of Macrinitza, any person having information of any kind, may freely and fearlessly appear and give evidence before the Commission of Inquiry sitting at the back house of Dorotheus, from 3 o'clock to-morrow, and thenceforth."

But the Caimacam had been two days before this to Macrinitza and warned the villagers of the consequence of giving evidence, as I am informed privately; and it is a fact which I hope Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration. Well, this affiche was put up in Greek and Turkish, and the Greek Consul having been informed of it, expressed his satisfaction at what Mr. Fawcett had done. But though he expressed satisfaction, he did not say that he considered that all had been done that was necessary, nor did he in any way modify what he had said before as to the necessity for a Government guarantee of the witnesses' safety. What followed? Mr. Fawcett says—

> "On the following morning, Regeb Pasha arrived from Larissa in time to attend the meeting. The Greek Consul, the Italian Consul, and others interested, were present. We waited a long time, but no witnesses came. I then proposed to Regeb Pasha, to which he gave his cordial assent, to put out the next day (Saturday) a further and stronger notice, in which the Pasha and myself gave our solemn personal assurance (parole d'honneur) that in no case should anyone suffer for any evidence they might give."

The following is the stronger Proclamation which was issued—

> "His Excellency Regeb Pasha, Governor of Thessaly, and Mr. Fawcett, Consul General in Turkey for England, the two Commissioners named by His Majesty the Sultan and Her Majesty the Queen of England to inquire into the cause of the lamentable death of the late Mr. Ogle, give public notice to all whom it may concern that everyone who can give any evidence concerning the circumstances under which Mr. Ogle met his death, is invited to come towards morning at 10 o'clock to the House of the Consul General, where the Commission sits. The two Commissioners give their solemn assurance (parole d'honneur) that everyone is perfectly free to come, and that no one on any account will be in any case molested or persecuted for any evidence he may have given to the said Commission."

That last sentence is important. It was, no doubt, not intended to bear the construction which the villagers put on it. It guarantees that the witnesses will not be persecuted for the evidence they may give; but it was not understood by the persons to whom it was addressed as a guarantee of immunity from persecution or molestation as insurgents. The next day, Mr. Fawcett says, he ascended the mountain and visited the scenes of the conflict, the three villages of Macrinitza, Portaria, and Eski Volo, and the exact place where the body of Mr. Ogle was found. He took with him Hassan, the cavass, who found the body, to point out the localities. He speaks of the exact place where the body of Mr. Ogle was found; but there is no proof in the whole of this book that the exact spot where the body of Mr. Ogle was found is known to this moment. Hassan asserts that he found it in a particular place; but his assertion is not corroborated, although there were plenty of people with him at the time that he asserts that he found the body; but not one of them being called, I say it is not proved where the body was found:—

> "The next day, Sunday, the 5th of May, another meeting was held, but no witnesses appeared. Mr. Fitzgerald, the Correspondent of The Standard, was present, and also the Greek Consul. These gentlemen said they had witnesses, but they would not come forward. I pointed out that already two witnesses had been examined from the village, and Regeb Pasha and myself having pledged our words, these people could have no excuse for keeping away. We adjourned till the next day, in the hope of their coming."

Then the last meeting was held; but, as before, no evidence was produced. The next thing Mr. Fawcett did was to consider his Report with Regeb Pasha; and if hon. Members will refer to page 43, they will see Mr. Fawcett says, he is > "firmly persuaded that Mr. Ogle met his death among the fugitive insurgents on the hillside, on Friday, the 29th of March."

He says one person from Macrinitza gave evidence, and another from Portaria. I will comment on that evidence, and show that where it is to the point it is utterly untrustworthy. Mr. Fawcett goes on to say—

> "Nothing could be stronger than the assurances of safety Regeb Pasha and myself gave, and I have come to the conclusion that no more evidence was forthcoming, simply because none existed."

That was an infamous conclusion under the circumstances, and I will shortly show why there was no more evidence forthcoming, though plenty existed. I will prove that there was good reason why the witnesses should be afraid to come forward and give evidence. The first Commission was composed of Mr. Blunt and Regeb Pasha, who commanded the very Forces which had been destroying and burning the villages where these poor people lived. Mr. Blunt was considered, rightly or wrongly, to be more Turkish than the Turks. The second Commission was composed of Mr. Fawcett, who was also a well-known philo-Turk. I do not say that Mr. Fawcett is unfairly partial to them; but everyone who knows him knows that he is a great lover of the Turks. He is almost as well known for his love of everything Turkish as the new Commissioner to Roumelia, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). The room where the Commission met was guarded by Turkish sentries; in the vestibule were Regeb's Turkish attendants, zaptiehs, Turkish soldiers, and others whom these poor people had good reason to fear, through whom they would have to run the gauntlet in coming in to give evidence, and who might well be expected to remember them and make them suffer after the Commission ended. Beside this, there is a general fear in the East of testifying to a murder or to the discovery of a body, for fear of being accused of complicity in the crime. Great endeavours had been made to keep the matter secret. In a despatch sent home by the Greek Consul, he says—

> "The Mutessariff of Larissa has been here (Volo) for the last two days. His object here is to obtain information as to the proceedings at Macrinitza. To judge by what he has effected so far, one would be inclined to think that his real object is to muster witnesses against the charge—to deny the facts stated, as the custom is in Turkey. Efforts are also being made to prove, in uniformity with the Ottoman allegation, that Ogle was killed in the course of the battle. The local authorities will have no difficulty in producing similar evidence. I am told that every possible effort is being also made to form the Commission charged with the investigation into Ogle's murder exclusively of persons favourable to the Turks."

The people understood why all these precautions were taken, and they were not stupid enough to run their heads into the noose prepared for them. I am told that in Thessaly, when a Christian has been murdered, it is the custom to imprison first the informer who gives notice of the murder, and, next, all the relatives of the murdered man. Two days before Mr. Fawcett's second Proclamation, the Caimacam of Volo had gone to Macrinitza and warned the villagers of the consequences of giving evidence. Guarantees of safety to the witnesses had been refused both by the English and Turkish Governments, and evidence was refused to be taken in private. And all this time the insurrection was still going on. After the battle of Macrinitza, a telegram from The Times Correspondent, dated Volo, 31st March, and published in The Times, April 4th, states—

> "Men, women, and children too, have been massacred at Macrinitza and Portario. Names of several are given, as Constantino Zanilieri, aged 65; C. Carvonaris, 70; N. Balambani, 75; Caterina Zitgonali, 45; George Valanages, 70."

The captain and officers of an Italian iron-clad also visited Macrinitza, and can bear testimony to the murders and shocking outrages committed there. As late as May 19th The Times Correspondent mentions skirmishes between Turkish soldiers and the peasantry of Pelion, whom the former were endeavouring to rob of their flocks. I think, therefore, I am justified in saying that at the time of the inquiry the insurrection was still going on, and that the witnesses would be either insurgents themselves, or people who sympathized with the insurgents, and who would render themselves liable to considerable danger by giving evidence. To get people to come forward, we ought to have assured them that they should not be molested, not for giving evidence there, but for being there at all. Besides, the word of Mr. Fawcett and Regeb Pasha would never induce Greek Christians to testify against Turks in a matter where, rightly or wrongly, grave suspicion was afloat against Amoosh Aga, the Chief of the Police of Thessaly. I would ask the House to listen while I tell them who Amoosh Aga is. He is a notorious brigand, who was imprisoned for his crimes; but, being released, after the manner of the Turks, he was made Chief of the Police of Thessaly. This man is a worthy comrade for Chefket Pasha, and has been guilty of murder, rape, torture, burning, and outrages of an unspeakable character. In March, when

Mr. Ogle was visiting Bulgarini—as detailed in The Times of April 4th, in the last letter but one which was printed, but not the last one which was received by that journal from Mr. Ogle—he was informed by the people of the place that some time before his arrival—

> "A number of women and children were shut up in two houses to serve the brutal lusts of the troops, who came in scores to debauch them, and not to debauch them only, but to beat and kick them, to tyrannize over them, and to outrage the very laws of nature, so that the place rang with their screams and with the brutal laughter of the fiends who revelled in those orgies."

A week before Mr. Ogle's visit the British Commissioner, Mr. Longworth, was there, and examined the people in the same house. They told him they were contented, and said nothing of these outrages. Why? They feared to tell the truth, because, as they informed Mr. Ogle, Amoosh Aga and the Caimacam were in the room. And Amoosh Aga had previously sent a corporal to warn them, "that if anyone should say a word against the authorities, he should not escape." After the skirmish at Konkonrava—a neighbouring village—on February 27th and on February 28th, Amoosh Aga sent a letter to the people of Bulgarini, telling them to send ten of their principal men to do homage, and that if they did so his soldiers should not enter their village. Having committed no crime, and taken no part in the insurrection, they willingly complied, and set out the next day—1st of March. They were seized by Amoosh Aga and his men, and brought to a spot between Bulgarini and Agia. Shepherds stood watching on the hills above—

> "The bugles sounded the halt, and here, by a brook, the wretched men were hacked almost to pieces by these cruel murderers. The bodies were then piled up like a row of wood, a row with feet this way, a row with feet that way, and branches, which had been placed beneath them, fired. The fire did not do its work completely enough to hide the crime, and when Mr. Longworth passed he saw the burned and blackened corpses;"

while Mr. Ogle, a week later, saw traces of the dreadful crime. Madame Zabanski, on page 54, speaks of Mr. Ogle's interview with Amoosh Aga, and relates how he upbraided him with his brutality, how Amoosh Aga first denied and then confessed that it was true, and prayed Mr. Ogle not to publish the outrages, and how Mr. Ogle refused to conceal them. Mr. Ogle said—

> "I have come to discover the truth; had I found that you had done no wrong, I should have written so; but, having been a witness to your crimes, I shall write about them, and everyone shall know them. Take care not to do such things again, for, if you do, I shall hear of them, and I will make them universally known."

In consequence of all this, Mr. Ogle felt certain that Amoosh Aga would some time or other make him suffer for what he had done. He said, on the day of his departure for Macrinitza—"I am sure Amoosh Aga will kill me, or will set someone to kill me." I think I have said enough to show who Amoosh Aga was. No doubt, Mr. Fawcett's and Regeb Pasha's promise would not be violated as long as they were on the spot. But Mr. Fawcett, it was well known, was leaving in a few days. Regeb Pasha was a General, and liable to be ordered away at any moment; but Amoosh Aga would remain, and who was to protect these poor people from his vengeance? They felt the full force of this, and it caused them to write under the Proclamation, in the night—

> "Turks, we know you! you shall not entrap us! Englishmen, assure us of safety, and we will give evidence! 'Slaves.'"

That their fears were fully justified was proved by the event. I read, in The Standard of the 13th of May—

> "It has been found necessary to send away three persons with their children who had privately given information concerning Mr. Ogle's movements on the 29th of March. They have been sent to Athens, their lives having been threatened if they return to the village. One was a woman whose husband had been killed by the Basi-Bazouks of Amoosh Aga."

I have now shown that there was evidence offered which was not received; and I will now refer to the three findings of Mr. Fawcett, which were as follows:—

> "1st. That C. C. Ogle met his death by a gunshot or bayonet wound, on Friday afternoon, the 29th of March, whilst retreating with the insurgents after the second battle of Macrinitza. 2. That he was afterwards mutilated, his head being cut off by Turkish soldiers."

Probably, in my opinion, to be taken as a proof of the murdered man's identity to the person who ordered the murder.

> "3. That his great imprudence made it extremely improbable that some casualty would happen to him."

Now, Sir, I say there is no evidence at all to show that Mr. Ogle met his death on the 29th of March, while retreating with the insurgents; but there is a large amount of evidence that he met his death the morning after the battle, when he could not be accused of taking part with the insurgents, or being guilty of any imprudence. All the depositions, which are to be found in the Blue Book, were taken before Mr. Blunt, and not before Mr. Fawcett. [These depositions—with the exception, I am told, of that of Pericles Mitrianos—were not upon oath.] What do the depositions amount to? In the first place, none of the Turkish authorities were examined, and, therefore, they could not be cross-examined. Nobody is examined who can prove anything; such evidence as there is, is, as Mr. Fawcett himself admits, in part hearsay, in great part, as I can show, unworthy of credit; while Mr. Fawcett allows that much of it is irrelevant. What is the first deposition which I shall allude to? It is that of M. Zabanski. He simply proves that Mr. Ogle was unarmed and on foot, and nothing else of importance. The second is that of Hassan, the Cavass of the Italian Consulate at Volo. This man was the main witness; but his evidence is entirely uncorroborated. He asserts that he found the body, but he could not remember what day he found it on a month afterwards. He was with a muleteer, Akilleas Kaffeggi, and a Christian of Volo, Nicolas Kazamias, as well as with two other Voliotes, whose names he forgets. He says that when he found the body they were all together, yet not one of the others is called, and not one word of his evidence is substantiated. They were, says Hassan, followed by five other men of Portaria and Macrinitza. There were other bodies of insurgents and villagers lower down, and there was also another headless corpse, appearing from its clothes to be that of a foreigner. Akilleas and his companions raised the body and carried it away. Thus, there were 10 persons present, some of whom are named; but none of them were examined in support of this man's evidence. Why was this, if not because it was feared that the other men would be unable to corroborate his story? Hassan is a member of a secret society called Becktash, composed of the most fanatical Turks; and I am informed, on good authority, that he was in constant secret communication with Regeb Pasha. Mr. Fitzgerald, of The Standard, gave me this information, and he most kindly authorized me to give his name. The next witness was Hussein Aga Haggi Matou. To this witness was confided the task of making public Mr. Ogle's passport, so that no Turk engaged in the battle might be connected with its discovery and called. The soldiers who brought the passport to the Pashas who gave it to Hussein Aga were not called. Then came Kostaki Markidi, who could only prove that Hussein Aga showed him the passport. Next was Jacob Vianelli, who is supposed to be an important witness; but who proves nothing material, and contradicts himself in such a manner as to render his testimony absolutely worthless. In a letter, which I will show privately to any hon. Member who would like to see it, I am informed that this man admitted to the writer that he was in the habit of sending false news for money to a Vienna journal. He confessed his fault, and promised not to repeat it. Let me call to the notice of the House the evidence of this man with regard to the permission of Hobart Pasha for him to go through the Turkish lines, about which he is cross-examined. He said, first, he gave it up to Iskender Pasha and had not got it. Then, when asked how he got back through the lines without it, he says he received it back and has it at home, and promises to bring it next day. The next day he comes without it, but says it is not material, and gives a verbal account of its contents. He again promises to produce it, but never does so. I heard of this man in Volo, when I was there last autumn, long before this affair, and was warned of his untrustworthy character. Sir, this man's testimony Mr. Fawcett considered important; but I say without hesitation that it is not to be believed. The next witness, Maulusurf, proves nothing, except that he read Mr. Ogle's passport; while the next one, Athanasion, proves no more. Pericles Mitrianos' deposition comes next, and I am glad that the Solicitor General is here to judge of the value of his testimony. He asserts, first, that he, being concealed, saw "towards the decline of the day"—that is, in an indistinct light—"a head being carried towards Macrinitza." He says the head had short hair, like his own, in fact; but he cannot well recollect about it. The hair was fair, but he could not well remember, as it was bloody. There was a moustache, but he cannot say whether there was a beard or not, the head was so bloody. Sir, a head upon a bayonet was not an uncommon sight in those days upon Pelion. There is nothing to show even that it was unlike the head of any Thessalian peasant. The hair was like Mitrianos' own in length. As to its colour, he cannot depose. Well, I say such evidence proves nothing at all, and is not worth the paper it is written on; and Mr. Blunt actually stopped the cross-examination of this witness who, on the authority of Mr. Fitzgerald, I state, was procured for Regeb Pasha by Hassan, and instructed by him. After giving his evidence, he went to Mr. Borrell's house and asked for a reward. They asked, what do you want a reward for? He answered—"Why, have I not given evidence to please the friends of Mr. Ogle?" They told him he was quite mistaken, and he replied—"At any rate, I said what Hassan told me to say." Yet great importance is given to this witness in Mr. Fawcett's Report. The evidence of Tzocanos proves nothing. He says he had never seen Mr. Ogle, but he saw a Frank riding on horseback on Friday; while Mr. Ogle is proved clearly in the depositions to have had no horse, so that the only thing he proves is that he knows nothing at all about the matter. Now, I come to page 51, the evidence of Dr. Diomedis, of Portaria, on whose evidence Mr. Fawcett strongly relies. He says—"The evidence of Diomedis is remarkable, though it is hearsay evidence." This Dr. Diomedis, after some uncorroborated evidence, supposes that Mr. Ogle was killed on Friday, and that he could not have slept at Macrinitza; because witness's sister and sister-in-law, at whose houses he had sometimes passed the night, had left the place and shut up their houses. That was no proof at all that Mr. Ogle did not sleep in some other house, or, as a Correspondent must often do, à la belle étoile. At page 43 of the Report, we are told that—

> "Not long before his death he got into a brawl with some soldiers, and was arrested, and brought to the Konak, and liberated with a caution to be more prudent."

Mr. Fitzgerald, in his evidence on page 50 of the Report, explains this affair, and says that Mr. Ogle told him that, on hearing the firing of muskets, he went out to see what was going on. He met some Turkish soldiers and followed them. As they advanced they saw some men who took refuge in some houses, and closed the doors. The officer who commanded the soldiers caused them to surround the houses. They then, with Mr. Ogle, approached the first house, knocked at the door, and the men opened it. As some soldiers ill-used one of the men, Mr. Ogle intervened, when the officer asked him what business he had to do so? But, as Mr. Ogle could speak no Turkish, and the officer no Greek, Mr. Ogle was arrested and taken to the Konak, to the Caimacam, who at once set him at liberty. Thus, what was really only a misunderstanding was magnified into a brawl. Mr. Fitzgerald states that the Wednesday before the battle, Mr. Ogle intended to set out for England on very important private affairs. Was it likely that in the midst of the insurrection, a spy, a revolutionary agent, would leave and go to England on private business? I should here like to quote Mr. Fitzgerald's statement with regard to what Mr. Fawcett says at page 41. He says—

> "Mr. Fawcett is decidedly in error in stating that I was misled by peasants of Drakhia, who imagined it was Mr. Ogle who passed the night in their village. I was from the first of opinion that most of the circumstantial evidence was due to the confusion of Mr. Souta's movements with Mr. Ogle's. I distinctly repudiate being in any manner a representative of Mr. Ogle's friends, beyond sympathizing with them in their grief at his loss. They entertained opinions I did not entirely share, and for which I cannot be held responsible. My admission to Mr. Fawcett was that, without satisfactory evidence to the contrary, I should be constrained to admit that Mr. Ogle was killed on the Friday; but that I knew other evidence was in existence."

This is from a private statement, but which I am willing to show any hon. Gentleman. In conclusion, Mr. Fitzgerald says—

> "I may say that from the very first inception of the inquiry under Mr. Blunt to the last lines of the Report by Mr. Fawcett, the intention to screen the Turkish authorities is evident throughout. The impression on myself, obliged to be present on the inquiry, was painful, for I felt that a prostitution of the British name was going on. It would have been better that no inquiry at all should have taken place."

That is the opinion of a gentleman who was clearly only interested so far as the ends of justice were concerned. Next comes the evidence of Kantargi, which proves nothing, while I may say the same of Ismail Effendi's. Then the evidence of Sakellarides speaks to the passport only, while that of Madame Zabanski shows that Mr. Ogle had previously been frequently followed by Ghegas, and also by a man supposed to have been an Armenian doctor. It shows that he asked the Caimacam of Volo for an escort to Bulgarini, which was not the action of a spy or a traitor, and, by an arrangement made by the Caimacam, got one. It shows that he remonstrated with Amoosh Aga for committing gross atrocities, and that Amoosh Aga had an enmity against him for doing so. It also shows that Mr. Ogle wrote a playful letter to Hobart Pasha, which is the only foundation for the assertion in the Report that Mr. Ogle set the authorities at defiance and insulted them. I have the authority of Mr. Ogle's nearest relatives in the world for saying that Hobart Pasha thoroughly understood the letter as a joke, and that he has since written to Mr. Ogle, of Sevenoaks, speaking of the deceased in terms of the highest commendation. Then, evidence was not only refused but suppressed. The man who bought Mr. Ogle's pocket-book from a Turkish officer was never examined, and the man who was found with his stick was never examined. Then, again, at page 59, you have a letter signed Emin Bey, which purports to give a description of Mr. Ogle. But the description is not a correct one, and such as it is, it was wrung from the man who gave it—a prisoner—while he was in the jail at Larissa. I am told that there is evidence to substantiate this statement. Then, there is the discrepancy in the medical evidence, which shows some inattention; but, in any case, whether the wound which caused the death of Mr. Ogle was caused by gun or by sword, it is quite clear that the death, according to the medical evidence, took place at close quarters, and not by accident, or by a dropping fire when the insurgents were in retreat. I will only refer to one more document—that at page 60—merely to mention that it is another memorandum not signed, and proving no more than the one I have quoted.

I have now shown what has not been proved, and that evidence has been refused. I will now show what can be proved. What can be proved, if another inquiry shall be issued, is, that in the first place, Mr. Ogle was not a spy; that he was not in constant communication with the Greek Committees at Athens; that he did not come over the frontier with the insurgents; that he did not set the authorities at defiance and insult them, although such a statement was made in the Report; that he did not get into a brawl as stated by Mr. Fawcett; and that he did not meet with his death on Friday afternoon while retreating with the insurgents. I cannot, unfortunately, give the names of the witnesses who can prove these things; but I can show them to any hon. Gentleman who wishes to see them, and they have been already submitted to Lord Tenterden. These witnesses can prove that Mr. Ogle, on the 29th of March, after the capture of the first line of the insurgent's defence by the Turks, left the battle-field with A. and B. In the afternoon of Friday, when the insurgents were in general retreat, Mr. Ogle was seen near the church at Macrinitza talking to C. That makes three witnesses who had seen him after the battle. Towards sunset on the same day—Friday, March 29th—at the time when he was supposed to be killed, he is spoken to at Lukopetra, the wolf rock, whither he had come from Portaria, to which village he had conducted some poor women and children from Bulgarini, whom he met at 2 o'clock, after the battle of Macrinitza, for safety, and about whom he wrote, as I have already mentioned, to a friend, asking him to take care of them. He is spoken to here by D. E. F. G. and H., besides many others whose names I do not know. That makes eight witnesses to Mr. Ogle's movements. That same night—Friday—he slept with many fugitive villagers in the open air, on this same shoulder of Pelion called Lukopetra; whereas Mr. Fawcett says he was murdered that afternoon. On Saturday morning very early, on the 30th of March, Mr. Ogle was on his way to Macrinitza from Lukopetra, with the object, as he told witnesses, of seeing the Pasha, and endeavouring to induce him to stop the pillage of the hamlet; and it was while on this philanthropic errand that he was killed. Witnesses can be produced who depose as follows:—A man of Macrinitza named K., with another man of the same place named L., was returning to Macrinitza on the Friday evening. They saw some Turkish soldiers coming down the hill, and hid themselves, spending the whole night on the spot. About an hour before daybreak on Saturday morning, Mr. Ogle, whom they knew, passed them going towards Macrinitza along an ascending path. This is Saturday morning, a day after Mr. Fawcett declares that he was killed. At the top of this path was a rock upon which K. states that they saw three Turks on one side and six on the other. As Mr. Ogle passed, they rolled three large stones down on him but missed him. Then the Turks came down, fell on him, assassinated him, impaled his head on a bayonet, and set off towards Macrinitza. K. and L., coming forward to see more clearly, were fired on by the Turks. L. was killed and K. escaped by flight. The body of L. is probably that alluded to in Streit's mémoire. That makes ten witnesses; the eleventh is M., of a village on Pelion, who declares that he was sent early on Saturday morning, the 30th of March, from Lukopetra by way of Portaria to try to enter Macrinitza to get a bag containing documents which was hidden in another person's house. All the names are in my possession. Between Portaria and Macrinitza he saw Mr. Ogle, whom he knew well, having acted as guide to him the day before, going on ahead towards Macrinitza. He correctly describes Mr. Ogle's dress—and I may here remind the House that there was no satisfactory description of Mr. Ogle given by any witness before the Commissioners. He lost sight of him for a moment owing to a winding of the path, and next saw him amongst 8 or 10 Turkish soldiers. He saw them strike him with a sword or bayonet. The witness then took to flight, and was fired on, but missed. These witnesses are corroborated by two others, a woman and a boy, mentioned in Streit's mémoire, which is generally well worthy of attention. Mr. Streit says—

> "On Saturday, 26th April, two witnesses were brought to me—an old woman and her son—inhabitants of the village of Macrinitza; to the best of my memory, these folks assert that they were present at the time when, on Saturday, the 30th of March, in the morning, Mr. Ogle was passing through the ravine between Portaria and Macrinitza to proceed to the latter village, with the intention, expressed to the witnesses, of negotiating for the stoppage of pillage and massacres. They told me that they saw him followed at a distance by some Turkish soldiers; that they themselves were afraid and hid behind some trees; that Ogle perceived that he was being followed and turned round; that the soldiers approached, killed him, unarmed as he was, by a shot from a gun, and thrust from a bayonet, that they also killed a peasant who was near him (probably L.); 'that they cut off the heads of the two murdered men after having searched and rifled them; that they afterwards threw away the head of the peasant; that they impaled Ogle's head on a bayonet through the mouth, and set off in the direction of Macrinitza and the Turkish camp.'"

This makes three sets of witnesses who independently witnessed the death of Mr. Ogle on that Saturday morning, the 30th of March. These witnesses had been also mentioned to me quite independently some time before the publication of Mr. Fawcett's Report by a gentleman of Volo, who had seen enough of Turkish conduct to desire his name to be concealed. I knew him in Athens, and I know his brother was murdered by Turks. A Greek called Ephthemethes, who had been to America and become an American subject, and on his return to Thessaly had taken a farm from Abram Pasha, the Khedive's banker, near Larissa, and to protect whom and to convey him to his country, an American man-of-war, The Marion, came from Smyrna to Volo harbour, told my informant on board the steamer bound from Volo to Athens, that he knew a woman and a youth who saw Mr. Ogle murdered by 10 Turkish soldiers.

Mr. HAYTER: Will the hon. Member say if they were regular or irregular soldiers?

Mr. H. SAMUELSON: I cannot say with certainty, but I think they were irregulars. These witnesses, and probably many others, would have testified before the Committee had the Government guaranteed their safety, and I firmly believe that they will do so now under the same conditions. A mixed Commission has failed, and therefore I ask that a new Commission shall be appointed of Englishmen only. The present would be a very good opportunity to show the Turks that we mean to enforce the safety of the lives of our subjects now that we are responsible for the good government of Turkey. Having undertaken that responsibility, are we to begin by allowing the murder of one of our own compatriots to remain unpunished, nay, screened, as I believe it has been in the most disgraceful way, intentionally or unintentionally? Better, far better, for the prestige of England and for the safety of the lives of British subjects residing in the East, that an inquiry had never taken place, than that such a travesty of justice had been allowed. I will read the following copy of a letter which, after setting forth the evidence I have quoted and other evidence, says—

"The evidence here set forth with the names of the witnesses is contained in a letter written in Greek by a person, whose name is given, to Mr. X., of Volo, and translated into French by a friend of his. Both letters will be placed in the hands of Lord Tenterden, if his Lordship should desire to have them in his custody. It is asserted that several persons, whose names are not given, can corroborate various parts of the evidence. We have the best authority for saying that every refugee, every person who knew anything about the late Mr. Ogle's case, has been examined by the right hon. Charilaus Tricoupi at his own house at Athens, and that, in the opinion of that gentleman, link by link, a complete chain of evidence has been formed."

Hon. Gentlemen know what weight is to be attached to such a statement from M. Tricoupi. I say I believe in the assertions of these witnesses, and corroborated as they are one by another, they carry conviction to my mind. I do not guarantee their truth—it would be very wrong of me to pretend to do so—but I demand that they shall be examined, and that their evidence shall be taken for what it is worth. But this can only be done under a guarantee that they shall be safe while they are giving evidence, and that, after giving it, they shall be removed to a place of safety, and this can only be done in the presence of an English Commissioner. There is a precedent for taking more notice of this case than has yet been taken. Hon. Members may remember the circumstances which attended the murder of Mr. Bowlby, The Times Correspondent, and some other Englishmen, in 1860, by the Chinese. A full account of it will be found in The Annual Register, 1860. At that time the lives and property of Englishmen were apparently valued more highly by the English Government. The Earl of Elgin deemed it his duty to take notice of Mr. Bowlby's high qualities in these terms—

"Mr. Bowlby was the Correspondent of The Times. I deplore his loss, not only because he was a highly-accomplished and well-informed gentleman, but also because from the liberal and conscientious spirit in which he addressed himself to the singularly complicated problems presented by the moral, social, and commercial condition of China, I had conceived the hope that he would be the means of diffusing sound information on many points on which it is most important for the national interest that the British public should be correctly informed."

Change the word China to Greece, and Bowlby to Ogle, and the same might now be said with justice. Lord Elgin, in a letter to Prince Kung, states—

"Until this foul deed shall have been expiated, peace between Great Britain and the existing Dynasty of China is impossible."

He goes on to say—

"What remains of the Summer Palace, which appears to be the place where several of the British captives were subjected to the grossest indignities, will be immediately levelled with the ground, this condition requiring no assent on the part of His Highness, because it will be immediately carried into effect by the Commander-in-Chief."

Those were different ways of dealing with such affairs in those days. A sum of £100,000 was also exacted as an indemnity. I ask for no indemnity; the friends and relations of Mr. Ogle ask for no indemnity; we do not ask for blood money—we ask for justice. Those murders took place when China was at war with us, and what penalties were paid! But the murder of Mr. Ogle took place when Turkey was not only at peace with us, but almost in alliance with us—almost actually under our protection. I hope I shall not have to say, as The Times said in a leader, on December 10, 1860—

"It is provoking to have to fear that there may be some of his countrymen whose ingenuity may possibly be exercised to excuse the crime."

The other day a debate took place in this House upon the execution on board the Beagle of a Native of Tanna, when the hon. and learned Attorney General said—"Human life was a sacred thing, whether it was the life of a savage or the life of one of Her Majesty's most civilized subjects." He said also—"It was right to attack savages who had murdered English subjects." We do not ask for any attack on the savages who took the sacred life of Mr. Ogle; we do not ask for summary justice to be inflicted; we ask for a new inquiry—for a fair inquiry. We say a sham inquiry is worse than no inquiry at all, and that it is a shameful mockery and, in our opinion, travesty of justice. Declaring that there are witnesses who can substantiate the truth, we claim a hearing for them. I do not go out of my way to charge complicity against the Turkish officials, although the Papers contain evidence on which such a charge could be based; but I leave that for the fresh inquiry to examine and decide. On a former occasion, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed me that > "The Government regarded the matter as one of serious importance, and that there was not the slightest intention on their part to dally with it."—[3 Hansard, ccxl. 1567.]

The hon. and learned Solicitor General reminded us, in the Tanna debate, that—"In England and in all civilized communities, criminality is not confined to the person actually committing an offence, but extends to those who aid, assist, and comfort the offender." I would ask whether Mr. Fawcett's Inquiry does not aid, assist, and comfort the offenders, and will not the Government be doing the same thing if it does not grant what in fair honour and justice I demand? Perhaps I shall be told my demands are not improper, and, perhaps, even reasonable; but that it is inconvenient, in the present state of Thessaly, to institute a fresh inquiry. No doubt, it will be difficult to hold such an inquiry—it is always difficult to hold an inquiry of this kind; but the question is whether the importance of the case demands that the difficulties should be surmounted? Why should the witnesses fear more now than before? Is the state of Thessaly more disturbed now than it was at that time? Or, are we afraid that if we institute a fresh inquiry, we may discover something more than the mere facts of Mr. Ogle's death? I ask whether the inhabitants of Thessaly are treated worse now than they were when Fawcett's inquiry took place? Is this all that we have done for the Greek population of Turkey? I ask Her Majesty's Government whether they will evade a fresh inquiry into the death of a murdered Englishman in order to get rid of a difficulty? A great country should never know difficulty in such a case as this. Justice to one of her subjects should override all difficulties. Sir, is such a difficulty to be weighed for a moment against the credit of England, which is at stake in this matter?

I am happy to say I have now arrived at the end of what I have had to say, which has been a very long task for me, and, I am afraid, a disagreeable one to the House; and in thanking the House for the great patience and forbearance with which they have heard my feeble statement, I assure them that all I demand is justice—bare, stern, impartial justice. I want to vindicate the fair fame of England. I want to take away the reproach from the mouth of Europe, that she cares no longer for the fate of her children in all parts of the world. If I be asked what good results I expect to spring from a fresh inquiry into this case, I shall reply—The dead, it is too true, cannot be restored to life; no more good work will ever be done by the hands that wearied themselves in good works; wrong-doers will never again be mercilessly exposed, or the wretched comforted, by Charles Ogle; but the parents who sorrow for the untimely end of a life of bright promise, the relatives who lament that unjust aspersions should rest upon the memory of one whose actions were irreproachable, whose honour was unstained; the friends who bitterly complain that a base and cowardly assassination should be allowed unnecessarily to remain enveloped in mystery—all these can be, in some small measure, comforted in their affliction, if Her Majesty's Government will consent to have the case re-investigated, fully, fairly, and impartially. On their behalf, then, and on behalf of our country's credit among the nations of the world, I plead for justice to the blood of a murdered Englishman. I cannot imagine a demand more fair, more reasonable, or more just. I cannot imagine a request more free from the possibility of injury to any except the guilty, and I cannot bring myself to believe that such a request can ever be refused by any Government which claims to represent the generous people of England. I beg to move the Resolution which stands on the Paper in my name.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in rising to second the Motion, said, that if before entering that House he had felt disposed to support it, after a careful perusal of the Papers relating to the death of the late Mr. Charles Ogle, presented by the Foreign Office, he should now feel doubly urged to do so, after hearing the very full and exhaustive statement brought before them by his hon. Friend the Member for Frome. His hon. Friend had apologized to the House for undertaking to bring to its notice so important a question as that contained in his Resolution; but he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was sure he spoke the sentiments of all who had listened to him, that the manner in which he had dealt with the subject was highly creditable to his abilities, to his regard to the memory of one whom he must call his murdered friend, and also to his sense of what was due to British justice. After the necessarily long and elaborate argument they had heard, he felt that he could not trespass upon the indulgence of the House; but still entertaining, as he did, a very strong opinion that injustice had been done to Mr. Ogle, both as regarded the circumstances under which he met his death and his conduct previously, he could not refrain from making a few observations, and in order to confine them within as small a compass as possible, he would give a brief outline of the facts of the case, and then, by a review of the principal features of the evidence upon which Mr. Fawcett was said to have based his Report, would proceed to show that that Report was most lame, inconclusive, and unsatisfactory. On Thursday, the 28th March last, the late Mr. Ogle was walking in the Promenade of Volo, in company with a little boy, the son of his landlord, M. Zabanski; and he believed that Mr. Fitzgerald, the Correspondent of The Standard, was with him. On that day Mr. Ogle had been expecting the steamer from Athens to arrive at Volo, and had the intention of returning in her, with the view of leaving Greece for England, in consequence of some domestic matters in his family which required his presence at home. The steamer did not arrive, and while the three persons were walking on the Volo Promenade, firing was heard in the mountains near Mount Pelion and in the neighbourhood of the town of Macrinitza. Mr. Ogle immediately proposed to go towards the quarter whence the guns were heard, and asked Mr. Fitzgerald to accompany him; but that gentleman declined, as he had a despatch ready for The Standard, and said he should stay at Volo, in the chance of the steamer arriving. The landlord's little boy was sent home, and Mr. Ogle went away alone, taking only the walking stick he had in his hand. So little idea had he of joining the Greek insurgents that he did not even fetch his revolver, which was hanging up in his room. From that Thursday afternoon nothing more was seen of him until his body was brought headless into Volo, and stripped of nearly every article of clothing, on the 5th April. If those who had perpetrated the atrocity thought to escape detection by stripping the body and cutting off the head, they were mistaken; for they had left a flannel shirt covered with blood upon the corpse, and when it was brought into Volo it was immediately identified by the landlady of the house where he had lodged by a similar flannel shirt being found in his wardrobe, and by a peculiar scar on the right wrist. On the Saturday afternoon, Mr. Ogle's friend, Mr. Fitzgerald, heard a rumour that something had gone wrong with him; but no precise information reached him on which he could act. The fights between the Turkish soldiers and the insurgents finished on the afternoon of Friday the 29th, when the Greeks were completely routed and fled in disorder in all directions. On Sunday the 31st March, about 1 in the afternoon, a Turk named Houssein Haggi brought some papers into Volo, and finding one among them which he could not read, being in English, he took it to the shop of Sakellerides, a jeweller, in the Market Place, and asked him to read it. Sakellerides, not being able to read it, showed it to M. Cortaki, who happened to come in, but he was not more successful; and, ultimately, they called in Sowlusuf, a Jew, who had arrived in Volo the day before from the Piræus. He read it, and ascertained it to be the passport of Mr. Ogle. It was given the same afternoon to Turkish officials, and, ultimately, to Admiral Hobart Pasha. That same evening Hobart Pasha met the daughter of Mr. Borrell, the Italian Consul, and said to her—"It is all up with your friend Ogle," or, in words described by another witness who was present—"Ogle, c'est une affaire du passé." Therefore, it was quite clear that the death of Mr. Ogle was known to the Turksh authorities on that Sunday afternoon, and, indeed, according to the evidence, Mr.

Fitzgerald was told that evening by one of the Turkish officers, "that Ogle had been killed in a breastwork of the insurgents with a rifle in his hand." As the insurgents were driven from their works in the first day of the fighting, this statement was to the effect that Ogle had been killed on Thursday the 28th of March. After this a man named Hassan, a chavass or chasseur, as he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) supposed him to be, of Mr. Borrell, was sent in search of Mr. Ogle's body; but the first time without success. He did not appear to have had any assistance whatever from the Turkish Commander, who had at that time—Monday, April 1—established a military cordon round the mountain, as low as Portaria, and might, he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) should think, have found and delivered up the body without difficulty. Be that as it might, it was only by a second search, on the 5th April, several days after, that the body was discovered by Hassan, and one or two men who accompanied him, in a ravine between Macrinitza and Portaria, wounded in several places, headless, and rapidly decomposing, and stripped of all the clothing, except the flannel shirt above mentioned. The body was immediately brought to Volo, and identified by the landlord, Zabanski, and the friends of Mr. Ogle. Now, upon these facts, supported by certain depositions taken at Volo before Mr. Blunt, the Consul at Athens—for Mr. Fawcett, as his hon. Friend the Member for Frome had already told them, examined no witnesses himself—came to the conclusion that Mr. Ogle was killed on the Friday afternoon, as he was running away from Macrinitza with the insurgents, and that his head was cut off, and carried to the Turkish camp. He would now look at the evidence in support of this theory, first premising that it, too, was totally at variance with the statements of Reschid Pasha and Lieutenant Skender Pasha, that Ogle was killed in the breastworks, with a rifle in his hand. The most important witness, whose evidence was found in the Papers presented to the House, was Houssein Haggi, of Larissa, who deposed that he received some papers from Turkish soldiers on Friday afternoon, the 29th, and took them up to the Pashas commanding the Turkish Forces. Among these papers was Mr. Ogle's passport, which none of them could read; and they gave it back, with the other papers, to Houssein to take care of. This paper ultimately found its way to the jeweller's shop at Volo. But there was this most important fact—namely, that Houssein said he slept at Macrinitza that night, and the next day—le lendemain—went into Volo. Now, it was quite clear that the day Houssein went into Volo was on Sunday, 31st, and, if so, the passport was shown to the Pashas on the Saturday, and not on the Friday. But the case did not rest there; for two other witnesses, who had nothing whatever to do with the passport—two men who claimed to be with the Pashas when the papers were shown them by Houssein—namely, Kantargi and Ismail Effendi, both stated the day to be Saturday, and not Friday. The witness Houssein, therefore, did not at all substantiate Mr. Fawcett's Report. For, if Friday was the day he was before the Pashas, all Saturday was unaccounted for. Then, another witness, Dr. Diomedis, had been called, who stated that he had been told by two persons that Mr. Ogle had been seen running down a steep ravine on the second day of the fight, in the direction of Portaria; and as he had not been heard of at that place, the presumption was that he was overtaken by Turkish soldiers, killed and mutilated, his head being carried by them to Macrinitza on the point of a bayonet. But why were not these two persons called, who might have been asked if they were sure as to the identity of the person whom they saw running? If not called, what credit could be given to their story? The rest of the depositions were of a piece with the evidence he had referred to; but he really felt reluctant to trouble the House at greater length upon the details so fully and ably handled by his hon. Friend. There was one main feature in the case, which he urged most strongly. If Mr. Ogle's death was known to Hobart Pasha, to Reschid Pasha, and Skender Pasha, on Sunday, the 31st March, well known as he was to everyone in Volo and the surrounding villages; if it were true that he fell while fighting with the insurgents, why did they not return his body to his friends immediately a search was made for it? Why did they allow it to lie headless in the ravine till the 5th April, when their scouts were scouring the mountain in all directions? Why did they allow a Turkish soldier to be seen walking about in the trousers of the murdered man? These circumstances satisfied him that it was not unknown to the Turkish authorities that he had met with foul play. But when, in addition to this, they knew that he had encountered the bitter enmity of Amouss Aga, the Chief Commissioner of Police in Thessaly, whose antecedents his hon. Friend the Member for Frome had described—and God forbid they should qualify any man, except in Turkey, for a Chief Commissionership of Police—when they knew that Mr. Ogle had not only actively interfered to prevent the barbarous outrages committed by the Turks on unoffending and helpless women and children, but that he had on several occasions given the poor inhabitants of the villages money to save them from starving, they might well believe that the death of Mr. Ogle might be fairly ascribed to a deep feeling of revenge against a man so beloved and respected throughout the districts. For his friend, Mr. Fitzgerald, said he was of so noble and chivalrous a character that he would at any time have risked his life to prevent oppression and cruelty. If the theories upon which Mr. Fawcett had based his Report were unsubstantial, and called for further investigation, how much stronger was the case when, as they had learnt from his hon. Friend the Member for Frome, several witnesses could be produced who actually saw the assassination early on Saturday morning, the 30th March, when an unarmed man was set upon by Turkish soldiers, and barbarously slain, stripped, and mutilated? He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was not aware who these witnesses were; but he had proved, without them, that the murder occurred on the Saturday, after all the fighting was over, and not on the Friday. Therefore, he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) most earnestly appealed to the Government to grant a further inquiry, and thus do justice to the reputation of this young man, whose good name had been assailed, and thus afford satisfaction to his family and relations, in whose hearts his character was more sacred even than his life. His hon. Friend had spoken of Lord Palmerston, and his readiness always to protect a British subject; but he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) well knew that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who at that moment sat upon the Treasury Bench, had in his breast quite as noble feelings as Lord Palmerston, and if injustice had been done to an Englishman, he would be as eager and forward to see it redressed as ever Lord Palmerston had been. He, therefore, appealed to his right hon. Friend to grant a further inquiry into Mr. Ogle's death. He could not believe that a Motion so fully justified would be refused; but, if it were so, all he could say was, he should leave that House satisfied that despotism was preferable to constitutional government, and that the British Government was an empty name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, Mr. Consul General Fawcett's Report upon Mr. C. C. Ogle's death is inconclusive, and that a fresh Commission of Inquiry ought to be instituted, composed of Englishmen only, who should be specially empowered to assure the witnesses of the protection of Her Majesty's Government,"—(Mr. Henry Samuelson,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BOURKE said, he was sure that no one who had heard the statement of the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson), or no one bearing the name of Englishman who read it could help deeply and sincerely lamenting the death of Mr. Ogle. There could be no doubt that the death of that gentleman had been accompanied by those barbarous acts of mutilation with which, unhappily, we had been made too familiar by the war which had just concluded, and at which he did not think it too much to say our common humanity shuddered. He entertained, also, no doubt that Mr. Ogle was a man of noble and intrepid spirit as well as of great intellectual vigour, and that he performed the important duties which he had to discharge with honour and fidelity. It was clear, too, from the Papers before the House, that he was ardently devoted to the Hellenic cause. He was glad, he might add, that his memory had had so able a vindicator as the hon. Member for Frome; and no one, he felt satisfied, could refuse to offer to the family of Mr. Ogle their deep sympathy in the loss which they had sustained. It was due, under all the circumstances, to him and them, that the case should be fully and fairly discussed in that House, and no one who had heard the speech of the hon. Gentleman could deny that it reflected great credit on his ability. After that speech he did not feel justified in taking up the time of the House by entering at any great length into the facts of the case. There was, however, one observation made by the hon. Gentleman which he felt it to be his duty to dwell on very briefly. He had stated that the country at the time of Mr. Ogle's death was not at war; but there could be little doubt that, for all practical purposes, a state of war prevailed. The hon. Gentleman then proceeded to say that it was impossible to obtain evidence in the case without guaranteeing the lives of those who gave it, and he criticized that part of Mr. Fawcett's Report in which he said that no such guarantee could be entered into. Now, in taking that view, Mr. Fawcett was, in his opinion, justified, not only by his instructions, but on the ground of common sense; because, unless the witnesses who gave evidence were prepared to leave the country—and there was nothing to show that they were willing to do so—or unless the British Government were prepared to occupy it in a military way, Mr. Fawcett could not give the guarantees of which the hon. Gentleman spoke. One of the charges which had been brought against the Consul General, therefore, in his opinion fell to the ground; and nobody could attribute any dereliction of duty in refusing to give the guarantee. As the House was aware, great efforts had been made by Mr. Fawcett to procure evidence; but they unfortunately failed, and no one, in his opinion, who read the Report with fairness could come to any other conclusion than that he was justified on the evidence which he was able to procure in arriving at the decision which he did. ["No, no!"] That, at all events, was his opinion; but he did not wish to enter into that question, for reasons which he would tell the House directly; but he would first remind hon. Members that Mr. Fawcett's Report had been corroborated by Mr. Blunt and by Captain Clarke.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON rose to Order. No Report by Mr. Blunt appeared in the Papers before the House.

Mr. BOURKE said, he had only just heard that such an expression of opinion on the part of Mr. Blunt had reached the Foreign Office. But upon the Papers before the House he did not think that any fault could be found with Mr. Fawcett for the proceedings which he undertook or the manner in which he acted. He believed that that gentleman brought to the performance of his duties a sincere and honest intention; and he could not see, from the evidence, that he could have come to any other conclusion than that at which he had arrived. Indeed, he might say that Her Majesty's Government were satisfied with the conduct of that gentleman, believing that he had discharged his duty in a bonâ fide and an honest manner. But a different class of considerations now arose, because the hon. Member for Frome had assumed the responsibility of saying that evidence could be produced which completely negatived the chief findings of Mr. Fawcett. A very grave state of affairs arose if a Member of that House took upon himself the responsibility of vouching for evidence of that character.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON said, he did not vouch for its truth. He merely vouched for its existence.

Mr. BOURKE remarked that the hon. Member, in the course of his speech, plainly said he believed that the evidence he was bringing before the House was true.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON said, there had evidently been a misunderstanding. He did not guarantee the truth of this evidence; but he demanded that it should be examined, and he did believe in its existence.

Mr. BOURKE observed, that in regard to the evidence of several persons the hon. Member vouched his own personal knowledge. There could be no doubt about that. In his speech to-day the hon. Member had not only disparaged almost all the evidence upon which Mr. Fawcett's Report was founded, but he had said that it was altogether untrue, and he had described the character of some of the witnesses as being absolutely infamous. [Mr. H. Samuelson: No!] "Infamous" was the word which the hon. Member used. Although the hon. Member did not guarantee the truth of the evidence he adduced, yet it seemed to him to be worthy of credit; and therefore Her Majesty's Government were placed, with reference to Mr. Fawcett's Report, in a different position from that which they occupied before the hon. Member's speech was delivered. The hon. Gentleman had asserted that Lord Tenterden had seen some of this evidence; but, for his own part, he could say it only came under his notice a very short time ago. He believed that Lord Tenterden also had only recently seen it, and then it was placed before them both in such a way that it was impossible to use it, because they were anxious to prevent the witnesses from getting into trouble. Consequently, no charge could be founded upon the neglect of duty by Her Majesty's Government because they did not produce this evidence, for as soon as they saw it they peceived it must fall to the ground. As, however, the hon. Member had now made that evidence public, there could be no objection to their making what use they could of it. In these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government were prepared to say that if these discrepancies—to call them by a very mild name—could be supplemented by further evidence, or if any of the evidence on which Mr. Fawcett's Report was founded could be contradicted, a fresh inquiry ought to be instituted, when the country was in such a condition that the witnesses could come forward and give their evidence. It would be impossible, however, for Her Majesty's Government to accept the hon. Member's Resolution, because it pointed to a fresh Commission of Inquiry composed exclusively of Englishmen. He was not in a position to say that he could force upon the Porte a Commission composed of Englishmen only. All he could promise was that Her Majesty's Government would do what they had done with regard to this case from the first. They would take the greatest interest in this case; they would get the very best Commissioners they could, and they would endeavour to take measures to give protection to the witnesses; though it would be impossible, in the present state of the country, to guarantee the safety of the witnesses without carrying them away to another country or occupying the Island by military force. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Resolution would be withdrawn. If the hon. Gentleman could suggest any inquiry which was not open to the objections he had urged, he believed a satisfactory arrangement might be arrived at. He regretted an expression the hon. Member had used with reference to Sir Austen Layard, which had led the House to infer that in certain instructions given to Mr. Fawcett, Sir Austen Layard had advised that the inquiry should be shortened for the purpose of concealing the truth. He hoped the hon. Member would withdraw that expression.

MR. H. SAMUELSON explained that he did not mean to impute to Sir Austen Layard a desire to conceal the truth. What he did mean by the expression was that the instructions which Sir Austen Layard gave to Mr. Fawcett were calculated, without his intending it, to have the result of concealing the truth by hurrying over the inquiry.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was glad to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, because he thought the hon. Member for Frome was justified in asking the Government for a more definite and distinct statement than that just made by the Under Secretary, as to the course which it was intended to take. The effectiveness of the speech of the hon. Member had been praised; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought its effectiveness was quite as much owing to the exceeding strength of the case as to the manner in which it had been brought before the House. He did not know that he had ever heard so strong a case made out for the re-opening of an inquiry. He understood that Her Majesty's Government were willing to re-open the inquiry; and the fact that Thessaly and Epirus were not yet in a state of complete tranquillity was no reason why the inquiry should not be set on foot immediately. Nor did he see the slightest reason why the British Government should not guarantee the absolute safety of the witnesses. If whoever was sent was authorized to say to the witnesses—"We guarantee that you shall not be injured either in life or goods for telling the truth, and we will take you out of the country if necessary," he did not believe that the witnesses would not be forthcoming. The very least thing Her Majesty's Government could do was to secure at any expense that these people should not suffer either in life or property. The fact that the transactions in question had taken place in that part of Turkey which, by the decisions of the Congress at Berlin, Turkey had been strongly recommended to give up to Greece, made it all the easier for the Government to take that course. There was the strongest primâ facie ground for believing that Mr. Ogle —a young man of great promise and the highest character — was murdered because he was telling the truth to The Times newspaper, and because he thereby exposed the unspeakable horrors committed by men in authority. Looking merely at the Papers, independently of what was said by his hon. Friend the Member for Frome, he was drawn most reluctantly to the conclusion that Consul General Fawcett did not sufficiently examine the case, and that there was nothing in the Papers that justified his conclusions. It might have been justifiable for him to come to the conclusion that nothing was proved one way or another; but it was to be regretted that the Representative of England, examining into the death of an Englishman, should have thought himself justified in making an accusation for which there was no warrant against Mr. Ogle's character; and he would be surprised and disappointed if the Foreign Office did not inform Mr. Fawcett that he was not justified in making that accusation. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER asked what the accusation was?] There was the strongest possible insinuation that Mr. Ogle was a spy on behalf of the Greek insurgents. The Report said—"In any other country he would have been treated as a spy and possibly shot." There was no attempt to prove in these Papers that Mr. Ogle acted imprudently, as had been asserted, even in his enthusiasm for humanity and his indignation against cruelty. Perhaps Mr. Fawcett might have thought it would be inconvenient to raise a controversy at that particular time with the Turkish Government; but such a consideration ought to have prevented the inquiry from being held, instead of causing it to be conducted as it was. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government, instead of waiting until Epirus and Thessaly were pacified, would set on foot a new inquiry at once, and that they would instruct their authorities to give every possible security that could be given to the witnesses. He had read with a great deal of pain the dispatch of Sir Austen Layard, in which it was stated it was alleged that Mr. Ogle was siding with the insurgents at the time of his death, and that he was warned of the danger into which he was running. Warned by whom? By Sir Austen Layard; because, if so, he must have had proof of the matter before the inquiry was opened. He did not think his hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson) ought to make it an absolute condition that the Commissioners should all be Englishmen; but he was of opinion that power should be given to the Commissioners to hear evidence by themselves if they thought proper to do so. An additional reason for demanding a fresh inquiry was furnished by the relation to which Her Majesty's Government now stood with reference to the Government of Turkey. Her Majesty's Government had undertaken to take steps to reform the Turkish Government in Asia Minor, which was the same Government as ruled over these Greek Provinces. Unless Her Majesty's Government informed the Turkish Government that gentlemen who went to Turkey to report the truth to English newspapers must not be murdered, and that this country would look after them if they were murdered, any attempt at reform in the Dominions of the Porte would be an absolute mockery. All that he (Mr. W. E. Forster) asked for was that the Government should insist upon an inquiry, and that they should instruct their authorities to give every possible security to the witnesses to be examined. They had an abundance of proof that in these inquiries attempts were made to prevent the English Government from knowing what had happened; and he had no doubt it would turn out that, in the present instance, the Camaicam went about the villages warning the people not to give evidence. The case was one which demanded inquiry as much as any case could demand it, and every attempt should be made to punish the murderers; and believing that it was as true now as in Lord Palmerston's day that a British subject ought to be safe in any country, he sat down in the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would inform the House that the Government were ready, both in justice to the murdered man and themselves, to order another investigation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he entirely re-echoed the closing words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He felt that the responsibility of protecting and safe-guarding the lives of British subjects abroad was a duty which lay upon every British Government, and he was perfectly satisfied that duty would be discharged by every British Government, whatever might be its political complexion. Englishmen ought especially to be protected when they were in countries where great agitation prevailed; and where, if they spoke truly, they might expose their lives to private vengeance or public danger. In such cases, the British Government ought to be particularly ready to extend their protection to those who were doing their duty. In the course of the discussion several remarks had been made respecting the character of the late Mr. Ogle, and it would almost seem as if there was a difference of opinion in the House on the subject. He wished, therefore, most distinctly and emphatically to say for himself—and he believed, also, on the part of the Government, and of all those who sat on that side of the House—that there existed no difference of opinion as to the character of the late Mr. Ogle. Whether he was less prudent than he ought to have been was a matter which did not at all affect his character. That he was a man of great courage and energy—that he possessed an amiable disposition, and was incapable of doing anything but what was highly honourable, had never been disputed by anyone. But that did not altogether dispose of the question at issue with regard to Consul General Fawcett's inquiry. That inquiry was as to whether Mr. Ogle lost his life in the action that was fought or in the pursuit that immediately followed it, or whether he was slain in cold blood on another day? It was in no sense a reflection on Mr. Ogle's character that it should be thought he had lost his life in the pursuit on the Friday. There was no question that he went out to see what was going on. Any man who did so exposed his life to danger, and it was quite probable that Mr. Ogle might have been unfortunate enough to lose his life in the struggle which occurred, or in the pursuit which followed it. Even if that view should be sustained, it would in no way reflect upon Mr. Ogle's character. Some injustice, he thought, had been done to Consul General Fawcett by the observations made upon him. Mr. Fawcett was a gentleman of high position, who had acted as Chief Judge at Constantinople for some years, and he was selected on this occasion because he was believed to be well qualified to conduct a judicial inquiry. Accordingly, he was sent to Volo in order to make the inquiry in the best and most solemn manner. What was he to do? He was put in communication with a Turkish authority who was associated with him in the conduct of the inquiry. Mr. Fawcett took what steps occurred to him in order to insure the bringing forward of witnesses, and there occurred in the Report a passage which the hon. Member for Frome had not read; but which, nevertheless, ought to be noticed. In describing what was done to induce witnesses to come forward, Mr. Fawcett said—

> "I informed the Greek Consul of this, who declared his satisfaction, and promised, if possible, to bring up the witnesses."

[MR. H. SAMUELSON remarked, that he had read that passage.] The hon. Member had been so fair in his comments that he probably did not omit that passage. Particular notice ought, however, to be taken of it; because it showed, not only that Consul General Fawcett did what he thought was sufficient to bring forward the witnesses, but also that the Greek Consul declared his satisfaction at what had been done. Mr. Fawcett and his associate, deciding on the evidence brought before them, came to the conclusion that Mr. Ogle was killed on the Friday in the retreat. Having read with some care the evidence as it stood, he was bound to say that, although there was not absolute and conclusive proof to that effect, yet the bearing of the testimony strongly supported the conclusion at which Mr. Fawcett arrived. When, however, the hon. Member for Frome came forward and said that there was a great deal of other evidence which could be adduced by persons whose names he did not feel at liberty to state publicly, although he would communicate them to the Government, a ground was certainly shown for further investigation. There could, consequently, be no question that it was the duty of the Government to see that the matter was properly investigated, and that there should be such an inquiry as would clear up the question as to whether such evidence as had been referred to by the hon. Member for Frome existed or not, and, if so, whether it could be relied upon. The hon. Gentleman did not guarantee that the evidence was correct, and nobody could call upon him to do so; but he said—"I do guarantee that it is tendered by persons who are really existing persons, and who, I believe, if an opportunity is afforded to them of coming forward in safety, will give evidence which will prove that Mr. Ogle was not killed on the Friday, but on a later day." In the circumstances, he had no hesitation on the part of the Government—and he spoke with the authority of Lord Salisbury—in saying that the matter was one which the Government were perfectly ready to carry further by a fresh investigation, and that they would conduct the investigation in such a manner as to give the Greek witnesses courage to come forward. Lord Salisbury's words on the subject were—

> "We would be ready to supplement the deficiencies of the evidence by a further investigation whenever the state of the country shall be such as to enable all the Greek witnesses to come forward without fear."

The Government did not mean that everything must necessarily be entirely quiet and peaceable in the country; but care must be taken that evidence was called for at a time and in a manner which would insure our being able to get the witnesses to come forward without encumbering ourselves with what had been called a guarantee of the British Government. He thought that an offer to remove witnesses whose lives were in danger would be a proper offer to make; and, of course, in such a matter, expense ought not to be considered. The matter should be further inquired into, and, in the circumstances, he trusted his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to press his Amendment to a division. In conclusion, he must express his sense of the ability and moderation with which his hon. Friend the Member for Frome had brought forward the subject.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON, on the understanding that the Government would institute the fresh inquiry as soon as possible, and that they would guarantee protection to the persons required as witnesses, begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ROUMANIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL rose to call attention to the sanction given by the Congress to the seizure by Russia of Roumanian territory contrary to the will of the people of that Country, and to the need of securing the real administrative autonomy of the provinces restored to Turkey by guarantees at least equal to those deemed necessary by the Conference at Constantinople. He maintained that a robbery had been committed upon Roumania, and that Her Majesty's Government should not have sanctioned that robbery. It would have been perfectly competent for the Government Representatives at the Congress to have told Russia that the matter was entirely outside their province. What course, he asked, did Russia take previous to the Congress? Under the Treaty made between Russia and Roumania on the 16th of April, 1877, His Imperial Majesty of All the Russias undertook to maintain and to cause to be respected the political rights of the Roumanian State as resulting from internal laws and existing Treaties, and to protect and defend the integrity of Roumania. That agreement having been made, as soon as the war was over, or before it was concluded, Russia announced her intention to seize a portion of that territory which she had guaranteed; and he regretted that Europe should have countenanced it through the Treaty of Berlin. He had always had the idea that this country should endeavour to maintain friendly relations with Russia; but the truth was—and it was well to recognize it—the Russian Government was essentially Oriental in its character, and only kept Treaties as long as they suited its purpose. It was of great importance to Russia that it should be able to say that it was acting on a European mandate in taking possession of Bessarabia. It was also matter for regret that Her Majesty's Government should have restored the provinces South of the Balkans to Turkey without requiring adequate guarantees for their good government. In this respect, Her Majesty's Government, it seemed to him, had altogether departed from the position taken by their Representative at the Conference of Constantinople. The Bulgarians, he knew, were not popular at present; but, from having passed some time among them, he could say that they had many good qualities as a people. He maintained that they ought not to be judged by the reports of Sir Austen Layard, which were of a strongly pro-Turkish character. According to trustworthy reports, the so-called Bulgarian atrocities were by no means so serious as our Ambassador at Constantinople had represented them to be. He rejoiced that a good deal had been done for the freedom of North Bulgaria; but he doubted whether it had deen done in the best way. The guarantees were not sufficient, in his opinion, and he protested against the intention which seemed to be established of allowing the people to be domineered over by the Turkish troops. It was the duty of the Government to see to that state of things, and they should have secured those ample guarantees which the Powers favoured. With respect to the provinces of Turkey in Europe not included in Eastern Roumelia, what had they to rely upon for the administrative autonomy and good government which had been promised? They had simply to rely upon the provision of the Congress of Berlin, which provided that those provinces should have Constitutions founded upon the model of the Cretan Constitution. He could not help thinking, however, that no more unfortunate model than that of Crete could have been selected. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had shown what a failure and a farce the Constitution of Crete had been. Believing, as he did, that it was out of the question to expect that the Turks would surrender any territory to the Kingdom of Greece unless they were forced to do so, his view had always been that Her Majesty's Government should have striven to provide for these provinces an effectual administrative autonomy, whereby they might eventually arrive at freedom and independence. It was time that the door was to a certain extent left open, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government might still deal with this question in the interests of freedom. But it was none the less true that the question of the constitution of these provinces was to be referred to a European Commission, of which the Turcophile Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) was a Member; and that fact did not furnish them with any ground for a sanguine hope that liberal treatment would be extended to the Christians. He should be extremely glad to receive an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that they were resolved that the autonomy to be given to those provinces should be real.

MR. E. JENKINS thought it was hardly right that the hon. Member for Christchurch should have been attacked on the Opposition side of the House for his Turcophile propensities; because it was to be hoped that in any case he would behave like an English gentleman, and would be prepared to carry out fully the desires of Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, however sincerely his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy might have spoken in regard to that hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. E. Jenkins) was anxious that it should not be supposed that there was an unanimous feeling of distrust or suspicion on that side of the House in regard to the manner in which the hon. Member for Christchurch would discharge the terribly responsible duties which had been assigned to him. With respect to the retrocession of Bessarabia to Russia, he was bound to say that, looking at the whole facts of the case, he did not see how Her Majesty's Government could have taken any very decided stand on that question. The injustice, if any, which was thereby done was very small indeed. The cession of Bessarabia to Russia was accomplished in 1816, under the Treaty of Bucharest, and it was confirmed by a subsequent Treaty in 1827. From 1816 to 1856, Russia had possession of the whole of Bessarabia; and the object in view in taking in the latter year of this small slice of territory from Russia was simply to drive her back from the Pruth and the Danube. That might have been good policy; but, on the other hand, everyone must feel that it was no unnatural thing that Russia should desire to effect this rectification of her frontier when the opportunity arose. Then came the question of the Treaty between Russia and Roumania for preserving the territory of Roumania. In the Memorandum obtained from the Czar by Colonel Wellesley, it was distinctly stated, if his memory served him right, that the retrocession of Bessarabia was to be one of the conditions of peace. Looking at the matter abstractly, there would not appear from the arrangement entered into by Russia and Roumania at the outset of the war to be anything dishonourable in the desire of Russia to get back this piece of territory which she lost in 1856, and for which Roumania had not shed a single drop of blood.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) that the appointment of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) might be taken as an intimation that the Government was desirous of favouring Turkey as much as possible. As to Bessarabia, it might be quite natural that Russia should desire to get it back; but she should have done so with the goodwill of the country that possessed it. As it was, Russia had acted dishonourably, and violated the first principles of justice in taking Bessarabia from her Ally.

MR. A. MOORE said, he had given Notice that he should call the attention of the House to the condition of pauper children in Irish workhouses, and make a Motion on the subject; but he was quite willing to postpone it, provided the Chancellor of the Exchequer would engage to keep a House for him to-morrow. He had already put off the question to meet the convenience of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would do his best to keep a House for the hon. Gentleman.

MR. COURTNEY said, he also had a Notice on the Paper which would take only a very short time. It was on the subject of the Transvaal, and representatives from the Transvaal were now here anxious to have it discussed. He would not bring it forward now, provided the Government engaged to keep a House for him to-morrow.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would be glad to keep a House for the hon. Gentleman to-morrow if it were possible; but it should be understood that the question in which the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) was interested should have precedence of the Notice of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). It would be very inconvenient not to take the third reading of the Appropriation Bill to-day, as in that case the House could not adjourn on Friday, and Members would be detained a day longer.

MR. ONSLOW gave Notice that he would call the attention of the House to the subject of Afghanistan to-morrow.

[BILL 197.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, "That the Bill be now read the third time" (Queen's Consent signified).

MR. E. JENKINS said, he must reiterate his protest against the measure. The more he had communication with members of the Church of England, the more convinced he was that the Bill was thoroughly unpopular with some of what he might call the most able and active section in it. The Bill was based upon this—that the State stepped into the place of the Church, created bishoprics, and then, through Her Majesty the Queen, appointed them, whether the Church wanted them or not. Such a horrible profanity and anomaly as that would not, he was sure, long be endured by the Christians of this country. He must ask the House to divide on the third reading of the Bill.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 20: Majority 42.—(Div. List, No. 278.)

Bill accordingly read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 197.)

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN said, that having, in 1860, opposed and protested against the Wine Licences and Refreshment House Bill for Ireland, he might consistently express his satisfaction at this Bill being ready for its third reading; but, inasmuch as the absence of compensation had been complained of in "another place," he might remark that no compensation was granted by the Forbes-Mackenzie Act for Scotland. At the same time, it must be remembered by their Lordships that the remission of the cost of the licence of one day in seven had been offered to the holders of the six-day licences in England; and, therefore, it would seem only just to grant the remission to those who were deprived of gain by this Bill. Yet those losses might possibly be turned into gains by the receipts from the increased numbers of bonâ fide travellers and lodgers on Sunday. The Committee presided over by the Duke of Westminster might take this matter into their consideration, and even if they did not recommend this reduction—which the Government, he presumed, might at any time grant by an Order in Council—he felt sure that the occupants of licensed houses would be greatly benefited by the rest which they would obtain; and the landlords also might lower the rent of hotels and public-houses and refreshment houses, a step which, in one instance, was taken by himself, on the suppression of a licence on his property, with great advantage to the tenant and his neighbours, and with lively satisfaction to himself.

Bill read $3^a$ accordingly, and passed.

ARMY—RECORDS OF MILITARY SERVICES.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the defective state of the records of services of officers of the Army, and, in doing so, said, he was acting in perfect consistency with the principle upon which the system of keeping records of military merit was framed—a principle which he had always advocated and supported from the time that his position enabled him to do so. That principle was one that was inseparably connected with the question of rewards, for it was impossible that the one system should be administered, and the other —the record of services—be neglected. When he was in India, after the Indian Mutiny, he received instructions to re-organize the Native Army in Bengal, the great majority of which—the discipline and efficiency being undermined by the transfer of their best officers to the staff and civil employments, and the anti-military privilege of caste—broke out finally in an armed and general Mutiny. He never missed an opportunity of thanking and rewarding the brave and loyal, but small minority; and he was convinced that the best guarantee for the success of the all-important mission of re-organization of the Bengal Army was the adoption of the principle of military reward for military merit—that reward being the patronage that was at his disposal as Commander-in-Chief for India, and the merit being the tested good services of the Army which had won their spurs under historic and brilliant traditions. He foresaw that this act of military self-denial, this proof of the interest which he took in the welfare of the Army, would increase his personal influence; whilst, on the other hand, the reward for past services and the asssurance that future good service would receive the same just recompense, would encourage the officers, to whom was intrusted the particular duty of carrying out the re-organization; and therefore, in a General Order issued by him, he gave his large military patronage to the officers of the Native Army, the sole condition being that they should deserve it, and it was under this influence the re-organized Bengal Army acquired its efficiency and self-esteem. The success of that re-organization was acknowledged by the Supreme Government, by the Secretary of State for India, and other competent authorities, and also by the valuable evidence of the Native Press. In recording his departure from India, all its journals added that he had kept his word to the officers, and had invariably rewarded military merit. There could not be a better example of the results than was afforded the other day by the military bearing and the spirit of the Indian regiments at Malta, which had responded with such alacrity and such loyalty to the call of their Empress to come to the front at a very critical time. It had been observed that the system of rewards for merit had been accompanied in India by failures. Now, the last attribute that he wished to claim was that of infallibility. A system like that, no doubt, had its shortcomings; but those that had occurred could not be very serious, for he never heard what they were. Only two or three instances occurred before he left India, and they were not unnatural. In those instances, the officers deserved promotion, but were not equal to the responsibility of the higher position. The remedy was not very difficult; the officers were instructed that they would not be promoted until they had acquired more experience and discretion. A mere description of the present system of recording the services of officers would be, he ventured to think, a fitting prelude to a demand for an improved system. At present a record was kept in every regimental orderly-room of the birth, death, entry, exchange, and retirement of the officers of the regiment, with the date of any action, battle, or campaign in which they might have been engaged, with the name of the General-in-Chief commanding. That record, which was accessible to the officers, stated their distinguished services, if any, in the field, and the wounds they received, as well as any mention that was made in despatches, and any promotion an officer might have received for good conduct in the field. But a second record was kept which was of a confidential character—mainly the reports of the general officers inspecting the regiment to the Military Secretary at the Horse Guards of the character and qualifications of each regimental officer, both in the field and in barracks, tested by an examination into the manner in which they performed their various duties. These reports were satisfactory so far as they went, except that the first one for the orderly-room was often too meagre; and in regard to the reports, they frequently had to send them back in order that they might insert the good services that had not been mentioned. With regard to the inspection report, he ventured to repeat an opinion which he had given to Committees and Commissions—that they should only be confidential when they related to matters of scandal not fitted for the public eye, and he thought that it would be fairer and more for the good of the Service that the regimental officers should be encouraged by a more confidential report of their qualifications; while, on the other hand, it would be a useful warning to the careless and inefficient officer, if he knew that there was an unfavourable opinion entertained of him by his superiors. There was a third publication which professed to be a general record of the officers' services, and that was Hart's Army List; but its foundation and spirit were equally false, and he ventured to think that there ought to have been long since established an official and responsible record of officers' services, carefully organized and compiled. As to Hart's Army List, he had no doubt of that gentleman's good intention; but the compilation was a self-eulogistic voluntary work, with official symbols, but without any official recognition or status whatever. That was the sole public registry of the officers' services, and the consequence of that was that officers in possession of statements of very distinguished services were unwilling to send them to a registry which was absolutely non-official; and, indeed, in his view, it was opposed to the principles which governed all military rules and regulations that officers should, uncontrolled by any authority, send a statement of their own services to a non-official record. One proof of the objectionable tendency of such a publication was the absurdity of some of the articles which formerly appeared in Hart's Army List, and to some extent did now. Not long ago, a noble Friend of his, not now in the House, showed him an article, the absurdity of which was perfectly ridiculous, and which certainly caused great amusement. But there was a worse feature attending this publication than simple ridicule, because it often happened that an exaggerated account of the services of officers who had no claim whatever on the country on the ground of the performance of distinguished services appeared in The Army List authoritatively as having received rewards and promotion. He had said enough to show that he could not associate himself with Hart and his compilation; but if there had been a responsible military office with the declared object of receiving, and, after examination, publishing them with authority, he should have been happy to have complied with the intimation, and should have considered it greatly to the interest of the officers. But no such office was in existence, and he was himself a sufferer by this system; because, while he could not identify himself, or associate himself, with the records of The Army List, he was in possession of records of services in every part of the world, which were quite unknown to his superiors and to his countrymen. He therefore complained that, under the present system, there being no official record, the services of many officers altogether escaped recognition.

Viscount BURY regretted that his noble and gallant Friend had not brought this matter forward at a time when the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief was able to be present; because they would have had that assistance from him which he was at all times willing to give, and which was so valuable when any military question came under the consideration of the House.

Lord STRATHNAIRN said, that he did not know that his Royal Highness (the Duke of Cambridge) could not be present to-day.

Viscount BURY gathered from the noble and gallant Lord that his complaint was two-fold. First of all, that the regimental record of services was insufficient; and next, that the other record of services which went to the Commander-in-Chief was confidential; and further, his noble and gallant Friend deprecated the voluntary records which were sent in to The Army List. The noble and gallant Lord said that he himself had suffered from the want of some official compilation, and he inferred from that that his services were not known in the Dominions of Her Majesty. That, however, was contrary to the fact; for everyone knew that his noble and gallant Friend was one of the most gallant soldiers of this country. At the same time, he quite sympathized with his noble and gallant Friend in his desire for an official compilation in which the services to which he had referred could be placed before the public otherwise than through the medium of Hart's Army List. His noble and gallant Friend, however, was quite mistaken in supposing that the record of his services was not perfectly well known to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and to the authorities of the Horse Guards. Indeed, his services had always been recognized by the fact that he had been appointed to high military commands, which he had filled both with honour to himself and great advantage to the country. It might be that an official record would be of advantage. He did not know what the terms of the noble and gallant Lord's Motion would be, and, therefore, he had had no opportunity of consulting with the Horse Guards on that point; but the noble and gallant Lord might be assured that he would take an opportunity of making inquiries and communicating with the illustrious Duke, and if any means could be adopted of obtaining a better record of the services of officers of the Army, he would take care that they should be. His noble and gallant Friend had mentioned the details of the records that were already made, and he (Viscount Bury) might refer to the medals given for good services and to the regimental orders, which, however, he admitted were not generally accessible. It was a very difficult thing for a general officer to make an absolutely perfect report; and if it were known that the reports which were made were to be made public, they would not be of that advantage to the Service that they were when they were of a confidential character, because it was obvious that matters which were mentioned in the confidential reports would certainly not be mentioned in the public reports. He did not, therefore, suppose that any alteration would be made in the nature of the confidential reports; but with regard to the other report, and to the absence of an official record in substitution of the voluntary record in Hart's Army List, he should be happy to bring the subject before the illustrious Duke.

Lord STRATHNAIRN expressed himself much obliged to his noble Friend, and begged to explain that he was so little aware that the illustrious Duke would be absent upon this occasion, that he had actually addressed to him a letter at the House.

House adjourned at Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past One o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—THE TITHES AND TAXES.—QUESTION.

Mr. E. JENKINS (for Mr. Rylands) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Daily News," of August 12th, that the Turkish Government has forestalled the collection of the tithes and taxes in Cyprus for the current year, selling the yield to the farmers and collecting the tithes in advance; whether there is any provision in the Convention of the 4th June which meets this case; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take in the matter?

Mr. BOURKE: No, Sir; we have no reason to believe that the statement quoted in the Question of the hon. Member is correct. The taxes have been collected up to the time that the Island of Cyprus were taken over by Her Majesty's Government; but there is no reason to believe that the collection of the taxes has been forestalled.

ITALY — DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH THE POPE.—QUESTION.

Mr. HOLT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether a statement recently made in the newspapers, to the effect that has any foundation in fact; and, whether there have been any direct or indirect Communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Pope or his Representatives on the subject of diplomatic relations with Rome?

> "difficulties have arisen temporarily delaying the re-establishment of relations with England desired by the Vatican,"

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, Sir; there have been no communication with the Pope or his Representatives on the subject.

TERRITORIAL WATERS JURISDICTION BILL.—QUESTION.

Sir GEORGE BOWYER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in accordance with the view expressed by the Attorney General last Session, any communication had been made by the Government to any foreign Government regarding the Territorial Waters Bill; and, whether any communication had been received from any foreign Government on that subject?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I understand, Sir, that there has been no communication between the Foreign Office and any foreign Governments on the subject of the Bill to which the hon. Member refers.

INDIA—THE MISSION TO CABUL.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, before it was decided to send the mission to Cabul, the matter was referred to the Secretary of State for India in Council, and, if the mission has been approved of by the Secretary of State in Council, whether any Members of the Council dissented; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay their dissents upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, Sir; this is not a matter that would come before the Secretary of State in Council. It is one of those matters which are of the same character as those which in former times, under the old Court of Directors, went through the Secret Committee. According to the provisions of the Indian Government Act, all matters which would have gone through the Secret Committee do not go to the Secretary of State in Council, but to the Secretary of State personally; and that, Sir, is the case in this instance.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the mission which is about to be sent to Cabul under Sir Neville Chamberlain has been undertaken at the invitation or with the consent of the Ameer of Cabul; and, whether he can give the House any information as to the causes that led to the cessation of friendly communications with the Ameer in the early part of 1877, and as to the reason for our ceasing to maintain an agent at Cabul?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have communicated with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, and he tells me that we do not at present know whether the Ameer has yet been asked to receive this mission. He did not invite it; but a communication will be made to him from the Indian Government proposing it. With regard to the cessation of friendly communications, that arose from the Ameer himself. It was on his part, not on ours, and it has never been fully explained by him. There were negotiations between Sir Lewis Pelly and an Envoy of the Ameer's, who died in the course of them. We have never had a European Agent at Cabul, nor have we asked for one.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question. My inquiry was with regard to the Native Agent we maintained there for many years, and which we ceased to do after 1876.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid I cannot give a better answer than the one I have given, which was that the cessation of friendly communications arose on the part of the Ameer, and I presume it was in connection with that that we ceased to maintain an Agent. The Agent we originally had there died at that time.

COAL MINES—THE HOMER HILL COLLIERY ACCIDENT—CASE OF THOMAS SHAW.—QUESTION.

MR. SHERIDAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to a Petition presented to this House, and signed by many hundreds of persons living in the borough of Dudley and its neighbourhood, asking for some further inquiry on the part of the Government into the practicability of recovering the body of Thomas Shaw, which lies in a coal mine called the New Homer Hill Colliery at Cradley, Staffordshire, where he was killed in the performance of his duty; and, whether he will endeavour to give effect to the wishes of the Petitioners, and to the prayer for a speedy and searching inquiry into all the facts of the case?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the last information he had received from the Inspector on this subject was that the mine was in a dangerous state, so that it was not safe to open it. He had directed the Question of the hon. Gentleman and also a Petition he had received on the subject to be laid before the Inspector, in order that further inquiry might be made.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—BATOUM.
QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information respecting the position of affairs at Batoum, specially with relation to the report contained in the "Daily News" of the 13th inst. to the following effect, viz.:

> "That Dervish Pasha has under his command 25 battalions, including one of Zeibeks. The town itself contains 12 battalions, and two field batteries. The last steamer brought 60 fresh artillery horses. The hills round the town are held by Turkish troops. One ironclad and one wooden frigate are anchored close inshore;"

and, whether the English Consul at Trebizond has informed Sir Austen Layard that the Lazes persist in declaring that they consider themselves under British protection, and that they will hoist the British flag on the advance of the Russians against Batoum?

Mr. BOURKE: Sir, we are aware that Batoum is still held by Dervish Pasha and the troops under his command; but negotiations are going on between the Turkish Government and the Russian Government for its surrender. That is all the information I can give the hon. and gallant Gentleman with regard to that part of his Question. Of course, we do not know how many troops Dervish Pasha has under his command. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I have to say that we have received a telegram respecting a Petition which the Consul at Trebizond has received from the Lazes, stating that if the Russians attacked them they would unfurl the British flag and consider themselves under British protection.

SPAIN—CASE OF GEORGE WHITE.

QUESTION.

Captain PIM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will be good enough, by telegraph, immediately, to cause inquiries to be made of the authorities at Havannah, Cuba, under what circumstances George White, an English sailor, of Gravesend, was imprisoned there now upwards of five months ago; whether any charge has been formally preferred against him; whether, if so, he was confronted with his accuser, or allowed professional advice or assistance; how long the imprisonment, with or without trial, is likely to last; and if the Foreign Office will make a speedy and complete investigation into the case, with a view to the early release of George White?

Mr. BOURKE: Sir, in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have simply to state that we have no details with respect to this case; but we are quite certain that Her Majesty's Consul at Cuba will take all the steps that are necessary in the matter. That being so, we do not think it necessary to send a telegram as suggested by my hon. and gallant Friend; but we will forward to the proper quarter a despatch upon the subject.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT (1876) AMENDMENT BILL — THE LORDS' AMENDMENTS.—QUESTION.

Mr. MELLOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, after this House had insisted on its disagreement to the Lords' Amendments to the Poor Law Act 1876 Amendment Bill, it would have been in accordance with the Rules of Parliament for this House to demand a free conference with the Lords regarding their Amendments to that Bill?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I believe, Sir, that it would not have been in accordance with the Rules of Parliament that this House, after having declared that it insisted upon its disagreement to the Lords' Amendments should have demanded a free conference with the Lords regarding those Amendments. I do not, of course, profess myself to be an authority on the subject; but I understood that you, Sir, the other day distinctly laid down the law upon that point. I observe that in some of the public journals there seems to be some confusion in the report of your rulings; but I apprehend I state them correctly now—that if, in the first instance, before insisting, or instead of insisting upon disagreement to the Lords' Amendments, this House had sent back the Bill with some slight Amendments of its own, it would have been possible then to have proceeded further; but that, having once insisted upon that disagreement, it became impossible afterwards for this House to demand a free conference with the Lords.

TURKEY—CRETE.—QUESTION.

Mr. MONK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any agreement has been entered into between Her Majesty's Government and the Sultan with respect to the future Government of Crete; and, if so, whether he will inform the House as to the nature of the reforms proposed to be introduced into the Government of that island, and state what guarantee will be given that those reforms will be effectually carried out?

Mr. BOURKE: I think, Sir, I had better remind the hon. Member and the House of the paragraph in the Treaty of Berlin which refers to this Question of the reforms in Crete, as I think the House might be misled by the question of the hon. Member, for he mentions the word "agreement." It does not follow from that paragraph that any agreement should be come to between the Porte and Her Majesty's Government on the subject. The words of the paragraph in the Treaty are—

> "The Sublime Porte undertakes scrupulously to apply in the Island of Crete the organic law of 1868, whilst introducing into it the modifications that may be considered equitable."

That is the undertaking on the part of the Sublime Porte, and therefore there is no agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Porte on the subject. We have, however, received information from Sir Austen Layard that he has had several conversations with the Grand Vizier on the subject, who had shown himself disposed to give full and fair consideration to the representation of the Cretan Assembly on the affairs of Crete.

NAVY — THE "GANGES" TRAINING SHIP.—QUESTION.

Mr. COLE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true, as reported, that it is the intention of the Government to remove the "Ganges" training ship from Falmouth to Portland; and, if so, what are the reasons for such removal?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Admiralty have had under their consideration proposals for the removal of the ship from Falmouth; but having received memorials from the local authorities against the proposed change, they have decided to postpone any decision until after the inspection in September. The grounds for the proposed change are that the boys in the ship are nearly all London boys, Cornwall affording scarcely any; that the position itself in which the ship lies is very exposed in bad weather, and the expense of keeping her there is probably larger than it would be at Portland.

TURKEY—ASIA MINOR—THE LAZES. QUESTIONS.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question with reference to the last part of his answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter). He has said that the English Consul at Trebizond has informed Sir Austen Layard — [Mr. Bourke: I said he had received a Petition.]—that the Lazes persisted in declaring they considered themselves under British protection. I beg to point out to the hon. Gentleman that if he leaves it there, it will have a very injurious effect; because it will appear as if the English Government accepted that situation contrary to the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty; and therefore I venture to ask him, Whether the English Government have sent any answer to the telegram? Otherwise, it will appear from his answer, as it now stands, that they are encouraging the belief that the English Government is supporting the Lazes in that pretension.

Mr. BOURKE: I cannot think that my hon. and learned Friend, or anyone else, would believe for a moment that the British Government have undertaken any responsibility with regard to the Lazes. The fact that the Lazes sent a Petition to Sir Austen Layard, saying that they will unfurl the British flag on the approach of the Russians to Batoum, and consider themselves under British protection does not, in my opinion, constitute any obligation whatever on the part of the British Government.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: That is not exactly an answer to the Question of my hon. and learned Friend. I suppose no one in this House, whatever may be felt elsewhere, would, for a moment, think that the Government would accept this responsibility; but what I wish to ask is, Whether the Lazes have been informed that the responsibility will not be accepted, otherwise these poor men may be misled?

Mr. BOURKE: I must remind the House that the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) was—

> "Whether the English Consul at Trebizond has informed Sir Austen Layard that the Lazes persist in declaring that they consider themselves under British protection, and that they will hoist the British flag on the advance of the Russians against Batoum?"

Therefore, the House will see that the answer I gave was a complete answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and my hon. and learned Friend will admit, as well as the right hon. Gentleman, that the Question they have asked is a totally different Question. I think they may rest perfectly certain that Her Majesty's Government will take those steps with regard to this position which will be equally just to the Lazes and will save the Government against any misapprehension that may arise upon this subject. They will not encourage the Lazes to believe that they are under British protection; and the House may be perfectly certain that Her Majesty's Government will undertake no obligation of the character indicated by the hon. and learned Member.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: I am afraid I must ask this Question. What was the date at which the information was received that the Petition had been sent from these men, and whether any answer has been sent or not?

Mr. BOURKE: It is impossible for me to answer that Question off-hand. If Notice had been given, I should have been glad to answer it. The communication was received within the last few days, but I have not got it here.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Surely, Sir, it is a very simple Question. Has any answer been sent? We will not ask any date, but simply whether any answer has been sent?

Mr. BOURKE: We have only received a telegraphic message from Sir Austen Layard stating that this Petition had been received by the Consul at Trebizond. We have not yet got the Petition itself, and, therefore, we could not have answered it.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS.—QUESTION.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has any objection to communicate the figures contained in the very important statement which he made yesterday to the House with regard to the health of the British troops at Cyprus? He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) observed that those figures did not appear in any of the Reports in the morning papers to-day; but he understood that the right hon. Gentleman had said that from 180 to 190 were on the sick list, of whom 56 were attacked with fever and ague. He should also be glad to know, Whether there would be any objection on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to communicate to the Press from time to time as they arrived any statements in detail as to the health of the troops?

Colonel STANLEY, in reply, said, he wished the hon. Baronet had given him Notice of the Question. He endeavoured, as far as possible, yesterday, to give the House the fullest information in his possession in regard to the health of the troops at Cyprus, and, in so doing, he was obliged to read from Papers which had only been put into his hands after he came into the House. He gave the figures as correctly as he could; but a subsequent perusal of them led him to think that they required to be corrected by comparison; and, therefore, to prevent misconception, he thought it best to communicate with the authorities of the Press, and to request that until these figures could be verified, they should be left out. He had not referred the previous day to any private document. He found, however, that the answer he gave yesterday was substantially correct; that although there had been numerous outbreaks of fever of a mild character, there had been nothing severe, and, as a matter of fact, only three deaths had occurred since the troops landed out of a force of 7,000 men. He would be happy, as far as he could, to make public such information on that subject as reached the War Office from time to time.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.

QUESTION.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Privy Council will issue the Orders stating from what countries cattle will be allowed to be imported into the interior?

Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he believed that those Orders had been prepared, and would be issued very shortly. He would take care to communicate with the Privy Council on the subject.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that a meeting of the Privy Council was summoned for tomorrow to prepare the issue of such Orders.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE REPORTS.—QUESTION.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER wished to ask a Question with regard to the Report on Educational Inspection which was issued every year. This was the first time, he thought, that the full Appendix had not been received during the Session. He should be glad to know when it was likely to be presented?

Viscount SANDON, in reply, said, he would make inquiries at the Privy Council Office, and do all he could to have the Appendix issued as soon as possible.

TREATY OF BERLIN, ARTICLE 18—REFORMS IN TURKEY.—QUESTION.

Mr. WHITWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the European Commission, constituted under Article 18 of the Berlin Treaty to perform certain duties in East Roumelia in three months, will, notwithstanding that limit of time, have to be prolonged, inasmuch as the Porte is bound under the 23rd Article of the Treaty to consult that Commission upon all schemes of organization which are promised to be made for Crete and various other parts of Turkey in Europe?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the hon. Member had not quite correctly interpreted the Treaty, particularly with regard to the paragraph which he (Mr. Bourke) had already read to the House with respect to Crete. He thought that paragraph was complete in itself, and the Commission established with respect to Eastern Roumelia had nothing to do with that paragraph. With regard to the other paragraph, which applied to the other Provinces of Turkey where reforms had not been introduced, schemes of organization and reform were to be introduced under the authority of Special Commissions, which would afterwards have to report to the European Commission. It was quite true that if these Special Commissions were not in a position to report to the European Commission at the end of three months, it would be for the Powers to consider whether it was necessary to prolong that Commission.

POST OFFICE, DUBLIN—PAY OF TELEGRAPH OFFICIALS.—QUESTION.

Mr. O'BYRNE (for Mr. Gray) asked the Postmaster General a Question, of which he had received private Notice, Whether he has received a Memorial from the Telegraph Clerks in Dublin Post Office, handed to the authorities in Dublin on the 23rd of last month, complaining of the inadequacy of their pay, and asking to be placed on the same footing as similar clerks in Manchester and Liverpool; and, if so, when a reply may be expected?

Lord JOHN MANNERS: Sir, no such Memorial has been received in London.

TERRITORIAL WATERS JURISDICTION BILL—[Lords]—[Bill 137.]

(Mr. Solicitor General.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

Sir GEORGE BOWYER, in rising to move that the Bill be read the third time that day three months, said, it was one which made a most material alteration in the law of England, and which greatly affected the rights of foreign countries over a portion of the seas. He was rather surprised that such a measure should have been read a second time on the previous Saturday, when it was understood that the House was to meet solely for the purpose of discussing the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. It must have been unexpectedly read a second time on that occasion, because his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, who had charge of the measure, was not present. He (Sir George Bowyer) had also to complain that it passed through Committee when discussion was absolutely impossible—he meant at 3 o'clock in the morning. They were now upon the third reading; and he thought the House would allow him, very briefly, to state certain points of law, which, he thought, ought to be considered by the House before the Bill was passed. In doing so, he would endeavour to take up as little time as was compatible with the importance of the subject. He would divide what he had to say under two heads. First, he should show that the Bill was not necessary; and, secondly, he would endeavour to show that the Bill was a contravention of the law of nations, and was unnecessary, because the law of England, as it stood at present, was fully sufficient without any fresh legislation. He would begin by stating what the law of England on the high seas now was. That portion of the sea between high and low water mark, when not covered with water, was within the jurisdiction of the ordinary coroner; and all that portion of tidal ports, estuaries, and rivers, which was partly inclosed by the territory of England, was within the counties to which it belonged, and was a portion of the realm of England. Beyond the low water mark, and over the whole of the high seas, there was the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty; and offences committed at sea were triable by the Court of Admiralty and the Central Criminal Court. Speaking generally, this was the chief jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. The Court of Admiralty, of course, had jurisdiction over all British ships and also in cases of piracy, which were offences against all nations. But the Admiralty Court had never claimed jurisdiction over foreign ships outside those parts of the sea which were partly inclosed by land, and which he had described. He said that the jurisdiction already vested in the Admiralty was fully sufficient to punish all offences committed on the high seas—that was to say, below high water mark—and therefore the Bill was unnecessary. He should be told, perhaps, that the Franconia case rendered it necessary that some legislation should take place. That he positively denied. What was the case? It was one of collision between an English and a foreign ship on the high seas—that was to say, within three miles of the English shore; and therefore, under the ordinary law of nations, would be within the international jurisdiction of the country off whose coast it occurred. In that collision an Englishman lost his life, and the captain of the Franconia was indicted for, and convicted of, manslaughter. A point, however, was reserved for the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and the majority of the Judges held that the conviction was bad. He was now told that, on account of the decision, some legislation was necessary—that it showed a defect in the law of England—that it showed a wrong which wanted remedying, as offences might be committed which England could not punish. He entirely differed from such an opinion. If a Frenchman killed an Englishman in Calais, the offence would not be within the cognizance of the law of England, and the Frenchman could not be tried in England, even if brought here. Then it might just as well be argued that the state of the law in that instance was a reason for bringing in the Bill for the purpose of extending English jurisdiction to Calais, or the whole of the French coast, as to say it was necessary to make an alteration because of the Franconia case. Instead of, in such cases, trying to extend the law of England, the proper course to pursue was to represent to a foreign country that a British subject had been injured out of the jurisdiction of the English Courts, and call upon the foreign country to deal with the person who committed the offence. It was a well-known principle of International Law that if a citizen of one country committed an offence against a citizen of another, and which could not be considered by the Courts of the country to which the injured person belonged, that was a reason for applying to the Government of the country to which the offender belonged, and requiring the Government to see that he was properly punished. If justice were refused in a case of that sort, that would be a sufficient justification for war. Let the House look at the Franconia case. After the conviction had been quashed in England, he believed the captain was tried in Germany, and his impression was that he was convicted. But what was complained of was that he could not be convicted in England. He (Sir George Bowyer) agreed that he ought not to have been, and he insisted that the proper remedy in the case was by representation to the German Government, and not by proceeding in the English Courts. Wherever the English Courts ought to have jurisdiction on the high seas the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was fully adequate for such cases; and where the criminal law of England did not apply now, there should be no alteration made, as proposed by the Bill; but recourse should be had to the country to which the offender belonged. He maintained that the law was perfectly clear. From time immemorial the law of England had been as he had stated it, and he could not conceive how in 1878 it was only just found out that it was insufficient, and that fresh legislation was necessary. Having disposed of that question, having shown that the law of England was at present fully adequate for the administration of justice on the high seas, he came to his second point, which was that the Bill was inconsistent with the law of nations, and with the rights of foreign countries. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) brought in a Bill which, in substance, was the same as that now before the House, and in a debate which took place on the Bill the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General spoke. He found, in Hansard, that the hon. and learned Gentleman was reported as follows:—

> "He admitted that owing to the state of the law, it had been declared by the Court of Appeal, it might be desirable to legislate on this subject; but he thought that before such legislation was embarked upon, it would be wise and politic to consult the principal States of Europe."

In a subsequent part of the speech, quoting again from Hansard, he found the hon. and learned Gentleman said—

> "He thought that before we embarked upon legislation it was essential that there should be some sort of agreement among the principal nations of the world with regard to the subject."—[3 Hansard, ccxxxiii. 1402.]

No doubt, the hon. and learned Gentleman saw very clearly that the Bill was one which might be held to infringe the rights of foreign subjects and the liberties of the seas, and therefore he said it ought to be a matter of international arrangement before England attempted to make a law which would be binding upon foreigners. He was ready to admit that there was a general concurrence amongst the nations of Europe that the three-mile zone was within the jurisdiction of the country off whose shores the ships then were. But the question was what that jurisdiction consisted of, and what the nature of that jurisdiction was. That jurisdiction was of a very peculiar nature, and not such as was sought to introduced by this Bill. It was not such jurisdiction as existed in the country, or as might be exercised in ships lying in ports, or creeks, or other partially inclosed portions of the sea. It was such a jurisdiction as might be exercised on the high seas—that was to say, the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty which existed now, and which had always been found sufficient for the purposes intended. That jurisdiction must be taken and interpreted as subject to the rights of other countries, and as subject to the freedom of the sea. According to the law of England, every foreigner who was in this country owed what was called a qualified allegiance to the Crown. He owed that allegiance in consideration of the protection which he received from the Crown while he was in this country. If the present Bill passed, it must follow that the crew of every foreign ship passing within three miles of the shore would hold that qualified allegiance to the Crown. It could not be said that the Crown gave them any protection, and yet they would be in the same position as if they were within the realm of England. No doubt, every country had jurisdiction over the seas so far as was necessary for the defence and security of its dominions; but it did not appear that the jurisdiction which this Bill created over foreign ships and foreigners on board them was necessary for the defence and security of the realm. If it could be shown that the defence and security of the realm required that the Courts of England should have criminal jurisdiction over the ships of foreign countries and the subjects of foreign countries on board them, he should then say his hon. and learned Friend had made out a case, and he would offer no opposition to the Bill. But could it be said that if, on board a foreign ship passing within the three-mile zone, a foreign sailor committed murder, the defence and security of England required that the offender should be tried by the law of England? Certainly not; and the real remedy for such an offence was that the man should be tried in his own country. There was a principle established that on the high seas every foreign ship was ex-territorial—that was to say, the persons on board were governed by the law of the mother country. That being so, he said there was no authority, and he defied his hon. and learned Friend to show any authority of International Law, much less of the law of England, to support the jurisdiction sought to be created by the Bill before the House. He would call the attention of the House to what was said on this subject by the Lord Chief Baron in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, in reference to the Franconia case. The Lord Chief Baron said—

> "The right to seize and try in England for an offence committed on the high seas by the foreign commander of a foreign vessel, can, in my opinion, no more exist than the right to seize and try in England any foreigner for an act done in his own country."

Of course the House would not for a moment entertain the idea of passing a law making a man who had committed an offence against a British subject in Calais liable to be tried in England, and yet the Lord Chief Baron said that was exactly the same as trying a foreigner for an offence committed on the high seas on board a foreign ship. If an Englishman and a Frenchman fought a duel in France, and the Englishman was killed, there was no jurisdiction to try the Frenchman in England for duelling. He would only be liable to his own country. The same, if a fatal fight occurred on board a ship within the three-mile zone. The only course to pursue if an Englishman was killed would be for the English Government to make a representation to the French Ambassador, and the man who killed the other would be dealt with by the law of his own country. The Lord Chief Justice laid down very much the same principle as the Lord Chief Baron. The Lord Chief Justice said that by the law of every nation, a ship, when on the high seas, carried the law of its own nation with it; and his Lordship showed that, in such cases as that of the Franconia, the three-mile zone was part of the high seas. His Lordship added that the right contended for—that was to say, the jurisdiction of the Courts of England over foreigners and foreign ships—never was the subject of any International Treaty, and there never was a Treaty which gave England the jurisdiction which the Bill before the House would give. Well, as part of his argument against the Bill, he must refer to an answer given to him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether any communication of the contents of the Bill had been made to foreign Governments, or vice versâ? He was told that no communication had been made to, and no communication had been received from, any nation on the subject. He (Sir George Bowyer) considered that a serious matter for the attention of the House. Here it was proposed to give the Courts of England common law jurisdiction over foreigners and foreign ships within the three-mile zone, as they were passing along, exactly the same as if those foreigners were on shore in England. Could the Government legislate in that way? Could they pass a Bill binding upon foreigners? He questioned whether foreigners would acquiesce in or submit to such a law. The Lord Chief Justice of England had said that even if we legislated for the three-mile zone, the law would not be binding upon the foreigner; and he (Sir George Bowyer) thought there was great danger and inconvenience in passing a law which, after all, people would not be liable to. We could pass laws for English people, but we made a mistake in trying to deal with foreigners. The Bill would actually make the three-mile zone British territory—as much as any county in England—and that being so, England could even, under the Bill, prevent foreign ships passing within the three-mile zone. But if we did that, it would be a gross violation of the liberties of the seas, and every nation in the world would protest against it. He had no doubt that if a case came before any of the Courts under the Bill, that they would say the effect of it was to make the three-mile zone English territory. The three-mile zone was a considerable portion of the sea, and to deprive foreign countries of the use of such a portion would never be tolerated. Were we prepared to allow the same jurisdiction in the case of other countries all over the world? Were we prepared to allow, even in the case of China, that a British ship, going within three miles of the shore, was liable to the laws of the country, and for some offence, real or pretended, an Englishman might be dealt with by the laws of the country? We had no right to make any distinction in these matters between civilized France and China or Japan. It might be either of them, and the law given by consent to one country must be meted out to all alike; because, for certain, if England claimed jurisdiction over foreign ships within three miles, foreign countries would do the same over British ships. But he was told that no prosecution was to be commenced under the Bill save with the authority of the Secretary of State, and that was supposed to be an answer to the difficulties he had urged. It seemed to him, to say the least, a novel way to legislate—to pass an important Act, and then say the Secretary of State should consent to everything done under the Act. Was it right or proper that the House should relegate its authority to the Secretary of State, give him the power to do that which was wrong, and then say he acted on his own responsibility, and might take proceedings or leave them alone, as he pleased? If the thing was wrong, the Secretary of State ought to have no authority; and if the Bill provided that which was in accordance with the law of England and the law of nations, let it be passed without any discretion vested in the Secretary of State. But the House must be careful not to pass an Act which was a contravention of the law of nations and of the liberty and freedom of the seas, and then say no harm would be done, as the Secretary of State was to have a veto under the Bill, and nothing could be done without his consent. This was a law affecting third parties—foreign countries—and he insisted that no discretion ought, in such a matter, to be given to the Secretary of State. Then there was another point under the Bill, with which he must trouble the House, as it was one of great importance. He had given his opinion on the point to his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General; but he did not agree with him, nor did the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor), who coincided with the Solicitor General. Of course, he (Sir George Bowyer) had the deepest respect for the opinion of his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, and for that of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General; but, at the same time, he must confess that his opinion remained unchanged. He had come to the conclusion that the provisions of the Bill would include foreign ships of war as well as merchant ships. A ship of war was exterritorial everywhere; because, if a vessel of war was in a British port, and an offence was committed on board her, the law of England would have no authority over the offender. The offence so committed on board a foreign ship of war must be dealt with by the law of that country and not by the law of England. What did the Bill provide?—

> "Any offence committed by a person, whether he is or is not a subject of Her Majesty, on the open sea, within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's Dominions, is an offence within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, although it may have been committed on board or by means of a foreign ship."

His impression was that the clause would include a foreign ship of any kind, whether it be a man-of-war or merchant ship. He found, by the Interpretation Clause, that "offence" was defined as any offence within the law of England, and ship as every description of ship. What could be wider than that? And as to a foreign ship, it was defined as "any ship which is not a British ship." Could anything wider be conceived? A foreign ship of war was not a British ship, and, therefore, it must come within the meaning of the Act. He could not see how his hon. and learned Friend could get out of the difficulty. If he entered into any argument on the point, notwitstanding his legal acumen, he would not alter his (Sir George Bowyer's) opinion. He had consulted his noble and learned Friend (Lord O'Hagan), who was one of the highest authorities on the matter, and his noble and learned Friend had said it was quite clear that a ship of war belonging to a foreign Power would be included within the meaning of the Act. That being so, he thought he was justified in mentioning these objections to the Bill to the House; and he hoped, after hearing what the hon. and learned Solicitor General had to say on behalf of the measure, that the House would agree to his Amendment. The hon. and learned Baronet concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir George Bowyer.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Hardinge Giffard) said, that the hon. and learned Baronet had had an opportunity of fully explaining his views on this subject the other night, when he (the Solicitor General) believed he had used the same observations that he had done on the present occasion.

Sir GEORGE BOWYER: The case came on at 3 o'clock in the morning, and there were only seven persons present.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Hardinge Giffard) said, although that might be the case, it was not his intention to detain the House by any lengthened statement in reply to his hon. and learned Friend. He would only say that the Bill was urgently demanded, that it was a very simple one, and it was rendered necessary in consequence of the decision of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in the Franconia case. He (the Solicitor General) had had to argue that case before that Court for several days, and probably the House would not desire that he should repeat his arguments to them at this period of the Session. The conviction in that case was quashed by a majority of 1; but Mr. Justice Lush pointed out that Parliament had full powers to legislate with regard to offences committed within the three-mile zone. The measure did not interfere with the principles of International Law in the smallest degree; on the contrary, its object and effect would be to bring their municipal institutions into harmony with International Law, and enable them to exercise a jurisdiction which was absolutely necessary for the safety of the inhabitants of this country. By the decision in the Franconia case, which must now be accepted as the law of England, the waters washing the shores of this country below low water mark must be taken to be out of their jurisdiction, and consequently the life and honour of any British subject bathing at the sea side—say, of a schoolgirl at Brighton or elsewhere—would be at the mercy of any foreigner on board a foreign ship who chose to take it. But the hon. and learned Member for Wexford had said that in such cases we must apply diplomatically to the country of which the foreigner was a subject, and get that country diplomatically to interfere. Anyone who had paid attention to the decision in the Franconia case would see that a foreigner committing a crime one inch below low water mark was out of the jurisdiction of this country. In order to create a jurisdiction, the person committing a crime in the neighbourhood of these shores must be a subject of this country; and the Bill had, therefore, been introduced for the purpose of affording proper protection to British subjects. As to the remark that foreign nations would interfere if this Bill passed, he held in his hand instructions which had been given by the German Government to the commander of a gunboat to take into custody any person not a German who ventured to fish within a distance of three miles from territory of the North German Confederation. That was a proof that that country claimed, like every other, the jurisdiction that was to be made unmistakeable by the Bill This Bill would effect a proper and wholesome alteration of the law, and considering that the noble and learned Lords who had discussed the question in the Upper House had expressed their opinions very strongly in its favour, he was surprised that his hon. and learned Friend should have stated that it violated all principles of International Law.

Mr. MUNTZ apprehended that the passing of the Bill might lead to serious difficulties and complications between this country and foreign Powers; but, at the same time, he thought that some measure should be passed on this subject. The only redeeming feature in the measure, and one he hoped which would be strictly observed, was the provision enacting that no action with regard to the Bill would be taken without the sanction of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State.

Dr. KENEALY said, that it was much to be lamented that the hon. and learned Solicitor General had not condescended to answer the powerful legal arguments of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer). Nobody could suppose that it was from want of skill or ability. His silence, therefore, remained without explanation. He had, indeed, spoken a few words, but had not in the least grappled with the subject; apparently taken it for granted, as had been so often done on the Treasury Benches, that to bring in a Bill was enough, and that it would be carried through the House, no matter what was said against it. He (Dr. Kenealy) begged very briefly to put the matter before the House as it presented itself to his mind. From time immemorial the law as to the three-mile zone had existed, and not a single instance had been cited where the law had worked any inconvenience. By the comity of nations, if any wrong was done within that zone, for which our own law did not provide, it had only to be referred to the foreign Kingdom of which the wrong-doer was a subject, and the wrong was redressed as a matter of course. In the case of the Franconia, it had been stated by the hon. and learned Baronet and not denied, that the sailor who by the law of England was acquitted here for want of jurisdiction, had been tried, convicted, and punished by his own tribunals; and that had always, as he (Dr. Kenealy) understood, been so, and, no doubt, would continue. That being the state of things, of what possible use was that new law? Laws were passed to provide against wrongs; but here there had always been a remedy afforded by foreign States. It was not wise to load the Statute Book with laws that were not needed. The Government, however, seemed to have set their hearts upon that new measure. They passed the second reading at 3 o'clock in the morning, when only seven hon. Members were present; and now they would hardly discuss it, on the plea, of which he did not see the force, that despatch was requisite. He (Dr. Kenealy) was wholly opposed to legislation conducted on such principles. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had offered, as almost the sole apology for his Bill, that Mr. Justice Lush had thrown out some suggestion to that effect, when the case was argued before the full Court. But Mr. Justice Lush could not be regarded as being responsible for that particular measure, which he had probably never seen; and whose provisions might at any time involve them in dangerous complications with foreign States. The hon. and learned Baronet had proved unanswerably that the words "foreign ship" included a ship of war. No legal tribunal could decide otherwise, if the matter were before them. They would decide according to reason and the English language, and shift all responsibility from themselves by throwing it on to this House. Let them suppose, then, an outrage on an English subject, a breach of criminal law, committed by a sailor on board a Russian or United States ship of war, within the three-mile zone. Were they prepared to board that ship of war, and arrest the foreign sailor by force? That was what that Statute authorized them to do. He viewed with apprehension the difficulties into which they might plunge, if they were to carry out such a provision. Yet the hon. and learned Solicitor General had not even alluded to that dangerous possibility. He regretted that the hon. and learned Baronet had promised not to divide the House; if he had done so, he (Dr. Kenealy) should certainly have voted with him.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was quite at a loss to understand upon what sort of a foundation the hon. and learned Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) made an objection to the Bill. The Bill was simple enough, and he believed that any person who had read any International Law would know that it would carry out principles perfectly well settled, and on which no doubt ever existed in the mind of any international lawyer. The effect of the decision in the Franconia case was not that the jurisdiction did not exist, but that there had not been a proper machinery created by our municipal laws to carry it out, and this Bill was merely intended to cure that defect. He did not believe that any nation in the world had ever entertained the smallest doubt as to its jurisdiction within the three-mile limit.

CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL.—[BILL 178.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

COMMITTEE. ORDER DISCHARGED. BILL WITHDRAWN.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he understood that it was intended to discharge the Order for going into Committee on this Bill; but, before that was done, he wished to make a few remarks with reference to the Notice given by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). It was understood that if the Bill were withdrawn, the Government would refer it to a Royal Commission. That was a course which he thought everybody highly approved. Speaking for himself, he did, and he hoped the Commission would be one whose recommendations might be confidently accepted. The codification of the Criminal Law not only embraced legal questions, but dealt with a number of questions which involved political principles of the highest importance—such as matters relating to religion—

Sabbath observance, the law of conspiracy affecting labour, and many others. It was unnecessary for him to bear his testimony to the admirable work which his friend, Sir Fitzjames Stephen, had accomplished in the draft Bill before the House. Nobody respected that gentleman's ability, or rated it more highly than he did; but in a work of that character they must have the help of different minds; it must be looked at from various points of view, and not exclusively in a legal aspect. In the case of the Common Law Procedure Act, great benefit was gained from having distinguished laymen like Mr. Henley and Sir James Graham on the Commission. In the present instance, he would warn the Government that if they persisted in constituting a purely legal Commission, they would entirely fail in the object they had in view—namely, of inducing Parliament to accept that Bill without discussion, and they would next Session be as far as they were now from any chance of passing it.

Mr. HOPWOOD also impressed upon the Government the absolute necessity of having a Commission large enough to necessary; for without that it would be represent every view, even lay views, if hopeless to pass any such measure as this. It was due to the working men of the country that the Bill had first been drawn up. They were in favour of getting the measure soon; but he was doubtful whether they would be satisfied with the Commission as it was proposed to be constituted.

Sir GEORGE BOWYER also thought that the Commission ought to be wide enough to include men of different views. Instead of that, however, the Commission was to consist of two Judges and the author of the Code himself, Sir Fitzjames Stephen. The Judges would have to do with their judicial duties, and the author of the Code, instead of being a Member of the Commission and voting in reference to the Code, should have appeared as a witness before the Commission. If they wanted men to do useful work, they ought to pay them for it. The Commission ought to have the undivided attention of one or more persons experienced in the practice of the Criminal Law. With regard to the question of the Criminal Court of Appeal, it was proposed to take three Judges from the Common Law Courts to constitute that Court of Appeal. Now, the Judges of the Common Law Courts were already over-worked; and if they wanted a Court of Appeal, they ought to have Judges who had nothing to do but to hear appeals.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Hardinge Giffard) said, that Mr. Justice Barry was to be added to the Commission in addition to the other gentlemen mentioned. The observations which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentlemen in that discussion would receive due consideration; but as to Sir Fitzjames Stephen, whether he appeared as a witness before the Commission, or as a Member of it, his opinion would receive great attention. No doubt, the absence from the Commission of the Lord Chief Justice of England might have been observed. It might naturally have been thought that Sir Alexander Cockburn should have been at the head of the Commission; but it was found that the public duties which he had to discharge were inconsistent with the continuous work which this Commission would have to discharge, seeing that it would sit at the beginning of November and proceed de die in diem until its work was completed. The appropriate task of the Commission would be that of getting the Bill into "ship-shape" order that it might be presentable to Parliament. The wide questions mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman would be properly discussed by Parliament. Parliament would be saved by the Commission from having a number of technical Amendments barring the progress of the Bill; but he did not see why Parliament should abrogate its functions with regard to the questions embraced by the Bill. He begged to move the discharge of the Order for going into Committee on the Bill.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the Government would never succeed in carrying the Bill next Session, unless they considerably modified the Commission in the direction suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. He, therefore, hoped they would give effect to the suggestions that had been thrown out.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Bourke.)

NAVY—H.M.S. "EURYDICE."

OBSERVATIONS.

Lord CHARLES BERESFORD rose to call attention to the circumstances attending the raising of H.M.S. "Eurydice."

Captain PIM asked, if the noble Lord was in Order in referring to this subject, seeing that a court martial was about to sit upon it.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the noble Lord was quite in Order.

Lord CHARLES BERESFORD said, he was extremely sorry to detain the House, even for one minute, at that late period of the Session; but the subject he wished to speak about was really so important a matter to the Navy generally that he must ask the House kindly to listen to him for a moment. He had been purposely keeping the matter back till the vessel should be floated; but it was obvious there could be no further delay. The universal feeling, both at home and abroad, was, first of all, that the naval people had been much longer than they ought to have been about the raising of the ship; and, secondly, that a private firm could have done the work much better and quicker. It was to defend the naval authorities against those accusations that he brought the subject forward; for they naturally felt very sore upon the point, as, in fact, did the whole Service. The point the court martial had to inquire into was the loss of the vessel, and did not not touch the one he was bringing before the House—namely, the raising of it—therefore, the slur would remain all the same. The Eurydice went down on March 24. Almost immediately it was decided to raise her, and the Press started the theory it was a very easy matter. Any amount of suggestions were offered by many people, nearly all theories. The Admiralty left the whole matter in the hands of the Dockyard Admiral at Portsmouth (Admiral Foley), and gave him an order to raise the vessel. He called together all the heads of Departments at his disposal at the Yard—namely, the Chief Constructor, the Master Attendants, the Chief Engineer, and others. The matter was talked over, most carefully considered, and thought out. The Admiral decided on a plan of lifting her with jewels and toggles; and from that day to this, with the exception of the first temporary lighter trial, the plan had remained exactly the same in every particular. Since the first attempt was made, there had been 17 failures, and what did a failure mean? A failure meant detaching the wreck from the lifting vessels altogether, all the pendents and purchases to be brought to afresh for putting down again—in fact, the whole of the laborious and delicate plan to be re-commenced. It was enough to break all their hearts, everything to be got ready so often. Everything was calculated most accurately; but it wanted one thing to make certain success — fine weather. On no single occasion did they get fine weather till she came out of the hole. The whole of the delay was simply an accident of weather. The wreck lay about three-and-a-half miles from the shore, in mid-ocean, in 75 feet of water, in a tideway that only ceased running one way or the other for 27 minutes each turn. The tide ran at the rate of 5 knots an hour. The divers who had to place the toggles and jewels could, consequently, only work 54 minutes out of the 24 hours, and that only with the weather permitting. The tide rise was only 12 feet, and the hole the ship had made was 12 feet, so she had to be actually lifted from the ground over 12 feet to clear her from the bank she had made. This was done by sinking the lifting vessels. The draught of the lifting vessels had to be increased 4 feet, and after pinning down and pumping them dry, the difficulties were enormous. They had 400 tons to lift over 12 feet to raise her out of her bed, and they were entirely dependent upon the weather, as she was in the open sea. The slightest breeze, not even a fresh one, would cause a swell, and as there were four vessels employed as lifters, it would raise one before the other, so that the immense strain would not come equally among them, and something must part, either pendent, purchase, or toggle. Therefore it was imperative to have quite calm weather and a perfectly smooth sea. He had now, he hoped, shown that the Eurydice could not have been raised out of her bed one minute before she was. After once getting her out of her bed, it was easy enough to float her along by shifts and shortening the pendents; but even after she was in 22 feet of water in Sandown Bay bad luck nearly overtook them again, as a gale sprung up from the southward and eastward, which, if it had continued, must have broken her up. The Admiral lifted her again and brought her round to St. Helen's, which made a total distance of six miles. The last part of the distance she was carried; she must have weighed nearly 600 tons, as she was more than half out of the water. Naval officers considered that the raising of this ship was one of the most remarkable things ever accomplished. A wreck had never before been raised in 12 fathoms of water with a five-knot tide. Now, as to the point as to whether a private firm could have raised the wreck, which was generally preached as a better and a quicker expedient. The wreck was within 11 miles of the largest and best found Dockyard in the world, the Admiralty had at their command not only the Admiral and all his most experienced officials and heads of Departments, but everything that could possibly be wanted, both in skill and appliances. The total value of the plant that was used, and without which the Eurydice would be now where she foundered, he made out to be over £150,000. There were six tugs, a steam lighter, four lighters, two corvettes, four coal hulks, and 230 men, all under discipline, consisting of fitters, shipwrights, riggers, seamen, engineers, and divers, all working under their different heads of Departments under the Admiral. What private firm or six private firms could have placed such a plant on the spot? There was no narrow-mindedness in the matter either; as in the most important matter of all—that was, the divers—out of the seven employed—and they were the men who really brought the wreck to the surface—three were from the private firm of Siebe and Gorman, so that, in the only matter there might have been a doubt about, men were used foreign to the Service. He was there himself nearly all the time from the day the wreck was first lifted till yesterday, and he could testify to the immense difficulites, the laborious, and even revolting, work the officers and men engaged had to go through. There was no doubt that a popular sentiment prevailed in favour of endeavouring to raise the ship which rendered it absolutely necessary that everything should be done by the authorities to get her up; when once it was undertaken, it became a national anxiety that it should be raised. One word about the loss of the unfortunate ship. It was generally believed that it was caused by want of seamanship. He ventured to say it would have occurred to any man under the same circumstances. Captain Hare, poor fellow, was one of the best seamen England had. He was specially picked for his duties on that account; while, with regard to what had been said as to the rest of the officers not being so good as they might have been, they were also all picked men. Then, again, it was said that the ship was crowding on too much sail; but as the ship was under the lee of the land the squall was never seen, else the usual precautions would have been taken, such as letting go sheets and halliards. She was hove at once upon her beam ends, and the men could not get up from the lee scuppers to let go the necessary ropes. A good deal had been said about the lee ports being open and too much sail on the ship. The lee ports were always left open in a smooth sea. It was the weather ports that were closed, as the wash and spray all came from the windward side. Any officer would have cracked on also under the circumstances with a smooth sea and a falling glass, and his port close by. Captain Hare wanted to drop his anchor before the gale came on, and before night set in, instead of beating about all night in such a dangerous locality. He (Lord Charles Beresford) had his own idea as to why the sail was not shortened before. To speak plainly, the very painful affair was a pure accident, just as much as would have been the running off the line of an express train. The deck clock was stopped at one minute to 4. The ship's company were piped to supper at seven bells. They never in the Navy turned the men up in their meal hours. He himself, as officer of the watch, had lost spars and sails by holding on a few minutes because the men had not finished their time. The men were at supper, as would be seen by their mess traps and the tea leaves in the basins, and all the bodies were in their right rig. Captain Hare meant, he believed, to turn the hands up, and shorten sail at 4 o'clock. The few minutes lost the ship, in his opinion. The squall, an awfully heavy one, struck her, and she took a tremendous quantity of water over her lee gunwale. It hove her under water. She was going at a great pace, and he believed she sailed to the bottom; she certainly was moving at a great pace when she struck the bottom, as her false keel was astern of herself on the bottom. He himself saw the bits and the belaying pins, and not one single rope was let go. He was sorry to hear, a few nights ago, a slur cast upon Captain Hare by the hon. Member for Falmouth (Mr. D. Jenkins). He could assure the hon. Member, although there was no doubt that what he had said he felt to be in the performance of his duty, that his observations would cause far more pain to the old messmates and shipmates of Captain Hare that he would ever know. From his own personal experience, he (Lord Charles Beresford) could state that Captain Hare was a splendid seaman; there could be no better; nor was there one who had more consideration for his men or for the lives the Admiralty intrusted to his keeping—in fact, it was, in a roundabout way, his kindness to them that really prevented him turning the hands up before their time, and so the ship foundered before he could do anything.

MR. D. JENKINS said, he was very far from intending to give any just offence to anyone in the observations he had made on this subject. He had brought forward the matter simply from a sense of public duty. He must, therefore, express his regret that anything he said had wounded the feelings of any officer in Her Majesty's Navy. Nothing was further from his intention than to express any direct opinion on the immediate cause of the catastrophe. He agreed in most that had been said by the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Charles Beresford); but having carefully listened to his remarks, he could not understand how the accident could have occurred under the circumstances he had related to the House; and he adhered to the opinion that Captain Hare was not on deck at the time the squall struck the Eurydice, nor was any experienced officer there at the time. He had been shipwrecked himself on two occasions, and each time he had found his recollection of what had happened to be so confused, that it was in no way to be relied on. He, therefore, thought that the two sailors who were saved, and who had said Captain Hare was on deck, were mistaken. The primary cause of the loss of the ship was, he believed, that she was not sufficiently ballasted when she left Portsmouth Dockyard on her last voyage. They depended exclusively on water ballast, and the ship was notoriously a very crank one. Unless she was sailed with the greatest skill and caution, in carrying canvas disaster was sure to follow. He only hoped, upon investigation, it would be found by the court martial that he (Mr. D. Jenkins) was in error, and that the ship was an inevitable loss through perils of the sea; but he was certainly of a contrary opinion.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD believed that the cost of raising the Eurydice would very far exceed the value of her carcase, and he thought it would have been much better, and certainly much less painful to the feelings of friends, if she had been blown up and the bodies collected before they were in the state in which they were discovered. With regard to any blame which might be thrown on Captain Hare and the other officers, he trusted that the public would reserve their judgment till after the court martial. He believed no blame attached to anyone, least of all to Captain Hare.

DR. KENEALY said, that the Admiralty ought to feel deeply indebted to the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Charles Beresford), who had come forward to whitewash its numerous officials. The Admiralty itself, like the unfortunate ship, had got into "a hole," and the noble and gallant Lord, with all the courage and chivalry of his country, was working hard to drag them out of it. He thought, however, that the whole of the proceedings connected with the Eurydice had been disgraceful to the Admiralty, and were not calculated to raise their Navy in the eyes of foreign nations. What were the facts? At 3 or 4 o'clock, on a bright afternoon in the month of March, the Eurydice, sailing within sight of land, all of a sudden went to the bottom with 500 men on board. She was not alone on the waters; there were many other vessels around her; but no accident happened to any one of them. Sailors in those ships, landsmen in the Island, saw her, and wondered what she was about. She was loaded with sails; all her ports were open. The weather had been squally, and almost everyone anticipated danger for the ship. Only those who were on board seemed fool-hardy, and defied the elements. Well, she sank. And what then happened? The noble and gallant Lord had told them, and he was willing to accept his version, though there was a different impression abroad. The Portsmouth officials met, and all agreed upon the proper and best mode of raising the sunken ship. But a whole month passed before they actually did, or even attempted to do, anything. During this time, the ship made for herself that 12-foot hole, of which the noble and gallant Lord had so plaintively told them in his elaborate speech. Was not that a proof of the greatest negligence? Could anything, in fact, be worse? An attempt had been made to account for, or defend it, on the plea that the winds and waves and hurricanes were so prevalent that nothing could be done. He himself had no personal knowledge of the locality; but he had spoken with several naval men, and all ridiculed the idea of the continual bad weather which it was pretended prevailed in Sandown Bay. He himself did not believe in the existence of typhoons all the summer round, in that particular bay, though if he were to credit the Admiralty reports that appeared in the papers, there was hardly ever anything else. But did the misconduct of the Admiralty end there? By no means. After a considerable lapse of time, the officials set to work, and all their hawsers snapped like threads. Now, the Admiralty had all the means and appliances of England at their back. They received unlimited sums of money; yet it would seem that they had no hawsers of any value when they thus failed on trial. What would foreign nations think of them, or of their Navy, when they learned these things? Five months and more had passed, and they had accomplished hardly anything, but to pull the ship to pieces; and hence the tales of storms and tornadoes, which in his judgment were merely fables, invented to cover our shame at failure. Allusion had been made to Captain Hare, and he did not wish to say anything against him. He had been praised highly as an almost perfect officer; and this must, of course, be accepted, for it was a well-known historical fact that jobbery, corruption, nepotism, and ignorance had never prevailed at the Admiralty. It was an Establishment with which all who were connected were absolutely without fault. This thing, however, he could not avoid saying—that all the mercantile captains who were making for land at the time when the Eurydice went down, saw danger before them, and made ready to meet it. Forewarned, they were also forearmed; but Captain Hare alone failed to see danger, or to take precaution. He sailed along in a stiff wind with all his ports open. In the tropics, it was usual to have all ports open, for the sake of air; but surely to do so last March, on the coast of England, was wholly rash and reckless! It was like the conduct of the Portsmouth officials in raising the wreck, who sought to drag her out of "the hole" by attaching toggles to the masts—which they pulled out in no time. This was as if they sought to remove a house, en bloc, by attaching hawsers to the chimnies. They had now raised the ship, at an expense, perhaps, of £15,000; and when she was broken up, as she must be, for fire-wood, she would not fetch £150. He considered that a public scandal, and a national disgrace.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure, Sir, the House will acknowledge that honour and credit are due to the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Charles Beresford) for the spirit in which he has spoken of this lamentable catastrophe. I feel, notwithstanding the remarks of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the work which has been done by the authorities at Portsmouth is a work which reflects great credit upon them. It was a work of extreme difficulty, the like of which had not been attempted by any men, or any body of men, possessing resources at all approaching to those of the Admiralty. As to the time that has been occupied in raising the Eurydice, the House will probably remember there was a case in which a ship went down in smooth water in the harbour of Holyhead, the depth being nine fathoms, or 54 feet. The

Edith was the property of the London and North-Western Railway Company, which possesses resources second only to those of the Government, and was not hampered by routine, or any other considerations, as to the use of the best means to raise the vessel; and yet it took the Company two years to raise it. I refer to this, because the hon. Member opposite (Dr. Kenealy) has stated that he had no personal knowledge, and I am sure he would not wish to make a misrepresentation of the facts; but he has spoken in a manner which he will probably regret when he becomes acquainted with them. No person who had a knowledge of what he was speaking about could have used the terms the hon. Member has. It is not a fact that hawsers have given way, nor that sailors who really have a knowledge of what they are speaking have used the term which the hon. Gentleman has made use of. I wish to say that we do thoroughly and cordially appreciate the work which has been done in the Dockyard; it is a work which has been accomplished under circumstances which have been unusual. Although there have been no typhoons, there have been very high winds at the Isle of Wight, and it is a fact that divers, who are used to work of this kind, and whose lives are of some value, and those who employ them, did think there was danger, and we did not think it necessary to insist on the divers going down when the state of the sea would have endangered their lives, and added to the catastrophe we all deplore. Persons who are competent to express an opinion, and who know the circumstances, admit that the work could not have been done more rapidly. It is not a work which is undertaken every day; it is not a usual thing to raise ships from the bottom of the sea; and I hope, so long as I am at the Admiralty, I may never have such a task to undertake again. As to the question whether the vessel should have been raised or not, I could not have undertaken the responsibility of blowing it up with the remains of gallant men in it. There was a universal feeling that we ought to make the attempt to raise it; it might be called a mere sentiment; but, whatever it was, I think, out of regard for the friends and relatives of the deceased in a grievous national misfortune, that it ought to have been complied with, and we cannot say that the labour and the money spent in raising the vessel have been thrown away. It is probably a fact that the vessel will be worth less than the money spent in raising it; but the feeling which has been satisfied deserves consideration on the part of this House; and I believe I have done no more than my duty in sanctioning the expense. I heard the remarks of the hon. Member for Falmouth (Mr. D. Jenkins) with pain. I cannot believe that anyone would desire to cast a slur on Captain Hare; but there cannot be a doubt that the remarks which fell from him would have that effect upon the minds of some men. We have it on the best authority that Captain Hare was on deck when the ship was struck; it certainly was his duty to be; and there is no ground for saying he was not where he ought to have been at such a time and in such circumstances. [Mr. D. JENKINS: I said in charge of the deck.] I think the captain must have been in charge of the deck at the time. It would be his duty to be there, and to suppose that he was not there is to suppose something exceedingly injurious to his reputation. I endeavour to avoid expressing any opinion at all on the circumstances of the disaster. It is our duty to investigate them in the best way we can by a competent court of naval officers, and we have waited until we have the ship up to find out precisely the position she was in when she was struck. I, therefore, do not think it right to express any opinion either as to the officers or the circumstances themselves; but I repeat, with the most complete confidence, I am justified by his service as a whole, by all who knew Captain Hare, in asserting that, up to the time of this accident, he was an officer on whom the most complete reliance could be placed—a man of great ability, knowledge, judgment, and discretion in the handling of his ship and in dealing with men. Rightly or wrongly, he was selected by my Predecessor—rightly, as I believe—because he had peculiar qualities for dealing with boys. When I had the pleasure of seeing him, six months before the accident, I was struck with the great intelligence he displayed, with the happy condition of the ship, and with the most cordial relations which appeared to exist between him and the officers. So far as

I know, no ship ever left these shores with a better crew, with a more experienced captain, or with better men qualified to work together in the training of seamen.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—PAUPER CHILDREN IN WORKHOUSES — INDUSTRIAL TRAINING.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ARTHUR MOORE, in rising to draw attention to the condition of Pauper Children in Irish Workhouses, and to the necessity of taking steps to improve their condition, especially in the matter of industrial training, said, that a Report had recently been presented to the Government, and he presumed they would take action on that Report during the Recess. In "another place," a noble Lord introduced a Bill in which he was much interested, which related to the Commission. He presumed that some consideration would be given to the matter during the Recess, and that was why he now troubled the House with a few facts. He did not wish to attack existing Boards of Guardians. His belief was that in Ireland the Boards of Guardians did their duty as fairly as they could, and he had always found them willing to do all they could for the children. The fact was that thousands of children were distributed in small numbers through the Irish workhouses. The effects of that system were these. He believed that under the present system of workhouses, self-respect and self-reliance were destroyed, and that idleness and debasement and a lowering of the moral tone were the results. Before he proceeded further, he must admit that there was a great difference in the workhouses in Ireland. He believed that some were upon the whole pretty well managed; but he was sorry to say, from his own experience as one who had watched the question somewhat closely, that there were very great difficulties to contend with, which, he hoped, in time would be removed. He wished to draw attention to the history of these Irish workhouses. The first thing that happened when a man entered was that he was supplied with a suit of clothes, and they might read a mile off, on his jacket or on his cap "pauper" of such-and-such an Union. This was an unnecessary aggravation. He believed it did not exist in this country, and it was very objectionable to the lower classes who were obliged from poverty to seek those places. The pauper was then thrust into a common bath used by many, and, judging from the amount of opthalmia that prevailed, it was fair to infer that many came out not so well as when they went in. The pauper was fed from a common plate with many others, and he had seen them without any plate at all. In some workhouses, he believed, there still existed the practice of requiring them to drink out of a vessel chained to the table, as if they were robbers. They were kept a little short of starvation; they could not be allowed to starve, because the Guardians would render themselves amenable to the law; but short of that, the means of life were dealt out in a most niggardly way. In some workhouses, indeed, the food was so bad that it could not be of any service to the children. At some of the workhouses, he had heard that it was the custom to turn the children out at the early age of 10 years, when the harvest came on, to any farmer who would take them and give them their food. They would stay with him a short time until he did not care to keep them any longer, and then they would go to some other farm. They spent the winter in the workhouse, and endeavoured to re-learn what they knew before; so that really no one had any care or regard for them, and there was no practical supervision over them when they were out of the workhouse. He knew that, theoretically, the relieving officer was supposed to exercise supervision; but he knew also that, practically, those overworked officers could not exercise any supervision. The child returned to the workhouse, where, he feared, the system that prevailed would not contribute much to his welfare. It was a system where there was no proper supervision, where they mixed and mingled a number of boys and men, and where the examples were such that they might corrupt the whole lives of these boys. It was, therefore, perfectly necessary to have proper supervision. On one occasion a small boy, seven years old, had been severely flogged. He was brought before the Guardians, who could not discover by any means who had flogged that boy. He might have committed some offence, and he might have deserved it; but the Guardians ought to have had some knowledge of who had performed that punishment on the boy. It was done in the middle of the night, and no information could be got on the subject. The reason of that was that the whole supervision of these boys, in common with the teaching, was left to one man who, when wearied and exhausted by the work of the day, was unfit for the supervision of them at night. Under these circumstances, they ought to give an industrial training to these children to fit them for their future life. He had looked in every direction, but he found that in no sense were boys and girls in Irish workhouses prepared in any way for their future. Six might be learning the trade of a shoemaker and two tailoring, making 2, 3, or 4 per cent. He had no hesitation in saying that industrial training did not exist. He did not see why this system should prevail. It was nothing short of a penal system; it was not relief. He considered the whole system was a mistaken one. He could well understand that the system should be made disagreeable to the adult pauper who was an idle vagabond; but in the case of a child, pauperism was his misfortune rather than his fault. There was another side to this question that was thoroughly recognized by the naval authorities, and that was the absolute necessity for the separation of children from adult paupers. Another of the evils of Irish workhouses was this—that a great many of these young children were contaminated from mixing with adult paupers. In many cases their parents were quite unfit to associate with them. He would read three or four lines from the able Report of Mr. Lentaigne, himself a Guardian of the poor since 1838, and Inspector of Reformatories and Industrial Schools, whose name would be received with respect on all questions connected with destitution. Speaking to the Statistical Society in 1877, he said—

> "My knowledge of the working of the Poor Law, since its introduction into this part of the United Kingdom, has convinced me that the cheerless gloom, and degrading influences and habits found in the great majority of our workhouses, are not surroundings proper for the reclamation and training of those children whose infant life has been contaminated and passed in the haunts of vice.
> "The pauper, whose adversity or misuse of life has driven him to end his days in a workhouse, is not the proper companion or instructor to form the character of youth. Broken down by adversity or degraded by vice, to him should not be intrusted the duty of imprinting on the weak but impressible mind of childhood a spirit of industry. He is unfit for such an office, and can never teach youth to do otherwise than to cling to charity for support. To prevent the vagrant and friendless child from degenerating into the criminal, far other and higher influences must be brought to bear, and no system short of that pursued in the Irish schools can ultimately be successful."

It was not alone in Ireland that this opinion prevailed. A few weeks ago a most valuable Report was presented to the English Local Government Board by Mr. Henley, Local Government Board Inspector. He was sent out to America to learn what was done for the pauper children in that country. The first State he visited was the State of Massachusetts. He said—

> "The children of this school are by law not treated as paupers, though they come from the pauper classes."

He would read two or three more short extracts as to the necessity for separation. Mr. Henley said—

> "The Legislature of New York, on the 24th of April, 1875, passed an Act to provide for the better care of pauper and destitute children, which made it illegal to commit any child over 3 and under 16 years of age to any poorhouse, unless such child be an unteachable idiot, an epileptic, or paralytic, or be otherwise defective, diseased, or deformed, so as to render it unfit for family care. But such children were to be sent to some orphan asylum, or other charitable or reformatory institution as now provided for by law. And the officers charged with the support and relief of indigent persons were to cause the removal of all children between the ages of 3 and 16, not exempted as above, from their respective poorhouses, on or before the 1st of January, 1876, and to provide for their support and care in families, orphan asylums, or other appropriate institutions, as now provided for by law. This Act was passed at the suggestion of the New York State Charities Aid Association. The reasons which influenced them are stated in the first annual Report of the Committee of this Association on Children, from which I will make a quotation—
> 'The fact that the door of a poorhouse must be open to every person in need of its shelter makes it easy to see that it can be no fit place to bring up a child, for it is impossible to separate the different classes of its inmates. The children of a tramp and casual lodger cannot be kept apart from the resident children, and girls just growing from childhood are exposed to bad language and worse example from the vicious of their own sex, who are too often but little older than themselves.'

"To the same effect as the above quotations is the following, referring to Massachusetts, from the twelfth Report of the Board of State Charities:—

'That the best poorhouse is but a bad place for children, no right thinking person will deny. The fact that they have been in such an institution tells against them whenever they go out. The enforced association with older inmates tends to corrupt them and nurture in them vicious habits. It breaks down their sense of self-respect and lessens their sense of self-dependence. Their minds are plastic and easily moulded. They naturally and inevitably come to look upon themselves as a class set apart for support at the public expense. Pauperism breeds pauperism. Through these children, who pass two or three or half-a-dozen years in the poorhouse, the line of pauperism is sure to be extended into the next century. From among them the ranks of the criminal classes are certain to be largely recruited, the road from the almshouse to the prison being one that is easily found.'"

He was not an advocate for detaining the House by copious extracts from Blue Books; but these were so entirely pertinent, that he might be excused for making them. He had spoken of the contamination from mixing the young with the adult classes. Another fact had come across his experience, which would hardly be credited when he mentioned it in that House, and which only need be mentioned to be put an end to. In some of the workhouses, women of the lowest class were employed as select nurses in the hospital. It was not the woman who had one or two illegitimate children; she was sent out to harvest. But it was she who had so many illegitimate children that she had to keep near them all day to attend to them. She was retained, when all other able-bodied paupers were turned out; and to her hands old men and children, and the sick members of the brave Irish Constabulary, who had no other hospital, were committed. In some workhouses, when children arrived at the age of 15, and owing to delicacy, or some other reason, had to stay in the workhouse, they were transferred to the elder ward, where every sense of decency they might have was soon wiped out through their being brought in contact with the vilest paupers. Every temptation was held out to them, by designing emissaries of their own sex, to apply for their discharge at as early an age as the rules would permit, and, when at liberty, without friends to advise or help them, without skilled knowledge to earn an independent livelihood, their ruin was speedily completed. He met with a most extraordinary instance in a rural workhouse. Three years ago, the Guardians of a certain Union made their inspection of that Union, and found it necessary to turn out a great many old and young, on the ground of their being able to earn their own living, instead of being a burden to the nation. Amongst them, they turned out three girls 15 or 16 years of age. These three girls went straight away to the house of the Roman Catholic priest and asked him to get them work, something to enable them to earn their livelihood. He said that was rather short notice; but if they would give him a little time, he would do the best he could. They left the priest's house and applied themselves to infamy and vice, and they remained common prostitutes in the streets for the last 13 years. A friend of his happened to go to a certain Board of Guardians in the North of Ireland. While he was seated in a room, 12 girls came into the room, all of whom were seeking the shelter of the house during their confinement. He trusted these cases were exceptional; but there was one thing quite certain, and that was —whereas, when boys were sent to a reformatory or industrial school, the results of those schools were tabulated; but with the Guardians, the moment the door was closed on an unfortunate child, their responsibility was then at an end. Why should not Guardians be called upon to furnish Returns? He held in his hand two letters; one was from the Chairman of a Board of Guardians in Ireland, who, speaking of his own Union, said that as a general rule, the children brought up in the Union workhouse did not turn out well; they had a tendency to crime of various kinds. That was a gentleman of good position, Chairman of the Union, and a wealthy gentleman. In another letter, a Roman Catholic clergyman, who had been connected with workhouses for 25 years, wrote that he had not known more than half-a-dozen children brought up in workhouses turn out well, and that they were idle, indolent, and unwilling to earn their bread by honest sweat. Now, he would appeal to his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) to take some steps to stop this, what he might call, waste of national strength. The existing practice was something like going to a shop to buy an article that they did not want, because it was at a low price.

He had the honour of introducing a Bill on this subject. Eighteen Boards of Guardians in Ireland petitioned in favour of that Bill. He did not say it was a satisfactory measure. He looked for something much better; but this Bill drew attention to the facts, and showed that some change was required. A resolution was sent from the Roscommon Board of Guardians, which ran thus—

> "That this Board, without committing itself to an expression of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Moore's Bill, desires to put on record that it considers that children who are dependent on public funds for their daily support are by right entitled to such industrial training as is calculated to make them useful members of society in after life; and that it further considers that their retention in workhouses, subjected necessarily to association of a more or less intimate character with persons whose lives, from a social point of view, have proved failures, is calculated to exercise a prejudicial effect on their future career."

This brought him to the two points he wished the House to see. What he asked was, for the Government to support the system of separation of the young from the adult paupers. It would be all very well if they could get a voluntary committee of ladies to carry out internal inspection. That was an admirable system, and he believed that when inspection was properly carried out the Boards would derive considerable benefit. What he asked the Government to do was what had been done in the United States, and what had been done to a less extent in England—namely, to establish large district schools, and take the children out of workhouses, and give them an industrial training. Under present circumstances, a grand opportunity was offered to the Government. Such a change would lead to the amalgamation of Unions and to some reduction in the number of workhouses. Accommodation was provided in Irish workhouses for 147,000; while the average number of paupers was 143,000. This gave as much accommodation as was necessary. In Connaught there was four or five times as much accommodation as was necessary, and in Ulster four times exactly. In a district of the county of Cavan there was eight times as much accommodation as was required. In another workhouse there was 10 times as much as was necessary. The workhouse in the county of Donegal had exactly 15 times as much accommodation as was necessary. These workhouses were kept open at great expense. In the workhouse at Ballycastle the average number on the list was 12 boys and 13 girls; they had to keep a heavy staff for 25 children. It was a monstrous waste of expenditure. In another workhouse there were six boys last year and 11 girls, making a total of 17. In the whole county of Monaghan there were 80 boys distributed over four workhouses. Then, he came to the county of Tyrone, where they had seven workhouses for 150 boys. He would not detain the House by going through the whole of the Return; but what he wanted to ask was that they should collect, in reasonable numbers, of course, the children in those industrial schools, and should give them the same opportunities for learning trades that he had seen given in the industrial schools of the English Metropolis. Let them be prepared for the Army and Navy; a very large contingent of the band boys in the Army were now furnished from the district schools, and he believed in that way a very large number of children were rendered useful members of society. Then, he should like to see the entire penal system abolished. He would treat the children as if they were Christians. Let them have amusements; make them happy and contented, and keep them until they were 15 or 16. They would never be content to fall back upon the old workhouse, after having experienced the happiness and comfort of those district schools. He believed that the most beneficial results would be attained. He would now come to the question of expense, and, in dealing with it, he should be very short. He did not think that the Guardians in Ireland would object to some increase of expenditure, if they saw a good result obtained from it. There might be some additional expense, but he did not think it would be very great. It had been calculated that the amalgamation of Unions would create a saving of £60,000 a-year. He did not know whether these figures were quite correct; but, nevertheless, there would be a very considerable saving. He had estimated the whole cost of bringing up these children on a different system. At present they were costing 2*s.* 11½*d.*

per week per head, and he believed that for 2*s.* per week per head additional, they could be brought up on the system he advocated. That would entail an additional expenditure of £67,000 upon the 13,000 children now in the workhouses. But he believed that the question was one far above expense. He believed the real way to look at it was this—they had a grave obligation laid upon them with regard to these children, and the real question was—Were they discharging that responsibility well, either on behalf of the children themselves, or on behalf of the country of which they were members? He thought he had said enough to show that, so far as the children themselves were concerned, much more might be done. He believed that for the country it would not be a little thing if these children could be made producers as well as consumers, instead of being as they now were, consumers alone; and he believed it would be an economy in the long run to teach these children some means of earning their own livelihood. He appealed upon these grounds to the hon. Gentlemen present, and to the Government, to rescue these children from the career of idleness and worthlessness, if not misery and crime, into which they were going, and to take them by the hand and lead them into paths of honour and self-reliance, and make them a strength to their country instead of a weakness.

Major O'BEIRNE supported the appeal made by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore). He thought that a fine field for recruiting for the Army and Navy was to be found among the pauper boys; but he must express the hope that if the Government agreed to direct their attention to the point raised by his hon. Friend, they would be careful to prevent any tampering with the religion of the children, which he knew had taken place, in some instances, with Catholic boys.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, he believed the House was under an obligation to the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) for the very able manner in which he had brought that very important question before it. Anyone who took as much interest in the pauper children of Ireland as the hon. Member deserved well of his country, for the extreme importance of the subject could not be over-rated; but it should never be lost sight of that Boards of Guardians were the parties who on the whole had control in this matter, and they could only have suggestions made to them. He ventured to hope that some of the extreme cases mentioned by the hon. Member were altogether exceptional in the administration of the Poor Law system, and that the attention he had directed to the matter would have a beneficial effect. The only Department over which the Government had any control was the Local Government Board, who, after examination, he thought it would be found had certainly not neglected the moral, physical, and educational welfare of the workhouse children. They had always desired that the children should have proper recreation and employment; and in the instructions given to the Inspectors they had directed that special attention should be paid to their condition, and every Inspector, on going the rounds of the workhouses, had to report to the Board how the children were employed, and how many of them were occupied in the various trades. It was also the duty of the Inspectors to see to the girls as well. The House would perceive, therefore, that the Local Government Board did everything in their power to alleviate the condition of the workhouse children; though, of course, if a child was obliged to go into the workhouse, it could not be expected that he would have the same comfort and excellent surroundings of other children. In one of the largest Unions in Ireland—the North Dublin Union—it had been found that a very large percentage of the children brought up there were readily and rapidly absorbed into the general population of the country, and engaged in proper and suitable employments. In very few instances had it come to the notice of the authorities that those children, when so absorbed, had misconducted themselves. The whole question—and especially that of industrial schools—was very important; but in the vast majority of cases it seemed impossible to exclude the children from all communication with the adult paupers, considering that in nine cases out of ten the parents of the children were in the workhouse with them. The Local Government Board had always given the closest and most anxious attention to the subject, and he had no doubt they would continue to do so.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—THE CORRESPONDENCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. COURTNEY, in rising to call attention to the recent Correspondence between the Transvaal Delegates and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, apologized to the House for bringing the matter forward at that period, and said: There are reasons why I think my course is inevitable, and why I have been unable before this evening to introduce my Motion to the House. In the first place, we have been unable to discuss this question of the Transvaal; because, until yesterday, the Papers on the subject were not printed and in the hands of Members. Had we had the pleasure of receiving them before, I should have hoped we might have discussed the matter at greater length, and in the presence of more Members. I may be asked, why we are not content with the circulation of these Papers? but I am sorry to observe that the journals who have taken any notice of these Papers have contented themselves with printing an extract, or extracts, from the answer of the Colonial Secretary, and have not given their readers any idea of the outside views of the question; so that, if we depended upon that alone, the country would get a very inadequate view of the situation. I think it will always be admitted that the question has gained importance from the fact that the Delegates have come over to this country to lay their case before Parliament; and that it would be, to say the least, impolitic, if they were to be allowed to go back to their own country saying that they were obliged to go back without having any discussion of their grievances in the Houses of Parliament. It would be desirable, on account of the relations between them and ourselves, that there should be some reference to the subject in the House of Commons; and although I promised I would be as brief as I possibly could in introducing my view of the case, I think I should be neglecting altogether my duty if I showed any unwillingness to enter upon a consideration of the question. Now, I do not propose to re-open the exciting controversies that occupied us last year. I do not propose to enter into the fundamental questions of policy which are at the bottom of the action taken last year; but I wish to direct attention to the actual state of things as now existing in the Transvaal, and to ask hon. Members to inquire of themselves what ought to be done in the present state of affairs? In April last year the Transvaal territory was re-annexed to England. I say re-annexed, because, at the Sand River Convention of 1852, we claimed then to exercise control over it. But by the Convention, which was ratified by those whom we may call the ancestors of the present Government, we acknowledged the independence of the Transvaal. But this annexation was justified on these grounds. It was said that the Government of this country was, in the highest degree, dangerous to its neighbours; that the Natives of the territories contiguous to the Transvaal had discovered, for the first time, the feebleness of the Government of the Transvaal; and that it was, therefore, dangerous to our Colonies at the Cape that the Transvaal Government should be allowed to exist in that state of feebleness. Now, as to the question of Sir Theophilus Shepstone. In the Commission given to him authorizing him, under certain conditions, to proclaim the annexation of the Transvaal, he was told to do it with the concurrence of certain authorities. The Lord High Commissioner at the Cape was to be satisfied of the concurrence of the inhabitants of the Transvaal themselves. Well, he did not obtain any formal act of sanction from the Lord High Commissioner, and he had no proof to offer that the inhabitants of the Transvaal themselves were friendly to the annexation; but he certainly assumed that they were thus friendly. Without that the annexation was incomplete, and the first thing that ought to have been cleared up was the action of the inhabitants of the Transvaal. Well, last year a Deputation came over from the Transvaal to see the Earl of Carnarvon, to remonstrate upon what had been done, and to beg that it might be undone. They saw the Earl of Carnarvon, who received them in the most friendly manner, showing them that the Act could not be revoked; but expressing his strong opinion that it was approved by the inhabitants of the Transvaal. He did not assert that that was the condition upon which his approbation of the Act depended, or that if it were disproved he would be content to give backto the inhabitants of the Transvaal their independence. But he did strongly assert that the inhabitants of the Transvaal were willing to assent to the annexation. Well, Sir, the Delegates who came over here were taken aback by that declaration. They themselves were firmly persuaded of the contrary; and when the Earl of Carnarvon offered them some kind of evidence in establishment of his case, they did not know what to do. At all events, they did not complete the instructions given to them when they left the Transvaal. They did not go to other Powers, as they had been desired to do if they failed in England. They went back to the Transvaal, and there reported the result of their mission. Well, when they got back, they were received with some sort of anger, and even suspicion. I rather think there was a feeling among the Dutch inhabitants of the Transvaal that their Delegates had deserted their duty. They could not understand how it was possible for Delegates to come over here and honestly fulfil their duty, and could have failed of success. In fact, there was some sort of belief that the Delegates had been bought over. There was a good deal of anger and suspicion felt; and I think that is an element which must be taken into account in forming a view of the present condition of the Transvaal territory. Well, the Delegates, I think, had no great difficulty in removing that suspicion; but it was at once resolved to take steps to disprove that assertion which the Earl of Carnarvon had made, and upon which he relied strongly, though he did not make it a condition upon which the annexation had depended. They took steps, by canvassing their countrymen and acting by means of a Memorial to the present Secretary of State, to show that, so far from there being a majority in favour of annexation, the vast preponderance of feeling was strongly against annexation. The Delegates met their countrymen, reported the condition of affairs, and, after a discussion, it was resolved to get up the Memorial. Of course, it was necessary that it should be circulated throughout the Transvaal, in order to obtain the signatures of the Dutch farmers. Thereupon the Administrator —Sir Theophilus Shepstone—issued a Proclamation, which shows, I think, in a very marked light, the attitude of his mind in regard to the administration of this country. I should have thought it would have been the clear right of the inhabitants of the Transvaal to have got up such a Memorial, so as to have represented what their views and wishes were. There is no allegation at present of their taking any steps beyond that of demonstrating their views. There is no suggestion of any action of a hostile nature being contemplated in order to enforce their demands. But Sir Theophilus Shepstone issues a Proclamation, which begins with this Preamble:—

> "Whereas the return from Europe of the Transvaal Deputation has been made the occasion, by designing persons, of creating and fostering agitation and alarm by imposing upon the credulity and ignorance of the quietly disposed inhabitants of this country, and of endeavouring, by the illegal use or assumption of authority—such as banding together of themselves into committees for the purpose of misleading the public, and coercing individuals by false representations, threats, and seditious utterances—to cause disturbances in the land, and to bring misfortune upon an innocent people,"

The grammar of the Proclamation is a little obscure. There are the beginnings of a number of sentences, and no endings. But the Proclamation goes a little further—

> "And, whereas the setting on foot of the said Memorial and other documents was promoted by a spirit of sedition, and their obvious object at the time known by those who permitted it to be; Now, therefore, I do call upon, enjoin, and strictly charge all peaceably disposed and orderly persons to aid the officers of the Government in maintaining order, and in bringing to justice the seditious agitators who have endeavoured, and are still endeavouring, to mislead the people of the Transvaal to commit a breach of the public peace and acts of sedition against Her Majesty's Government, thereby bringing serious misfortune upon the country and its inhabitants; And I do further hereby warn all such mischievous and evil-disposed persons as may be found to be fomenting or instigating any such unlawful agitation, and who, by threats, seditious words, whether spoken, written, or printed, or by any other means, are engaged in inciting the people of this country to acts of disloyalty, sedition, resistance to or rebellion against the Government, that they are hereby made and held liable, and subject, under the law and this my Proclamation, to imprisonment, fine, and such other and further punishments as the law may direct."

Now, Sir, I will pass on to the result which ensued. It is to be found in page 9—

> "To us were handed over 157 distinct Memorials, of which 125 were signed by enfranchised burghers, who were against the annexation, and thus against British rule, and 31 signed by enfranchised burghers of the South African Republic, who were in favour of annexation, and therefore satisfied with British rule; while we have found one Memorial signed by enfranchised burghers of the South African Republic, who were against annexation, but further signed as a true copy. On the 125 distinct Memorials handed over to us signed against the annexation, we have found 6,591 signatures; on the 31 Memorials signed for the annexation, 587 signatures; while on the Memorial signed as a true copy, 85 signatures were found."

Well, there you have 125 Memorials against annexation, and 31 for it—say, a majority of about 4 to 1. To the 125 distinct Memorials which are against annexation, we have 6,591 signatures; while to the 31 Memorials in favour of annexation, there are only 587 signatures. So that the actual signatures against annexation are in a majority of nearly 12 to 1. It must be added that the 6,591 signatures are those of the adult males of the Transvaal—the total number of adult males in the Transvaal being 8,000. Thus, out of a total of 8,000, you have nearly 6,600 declaring their total unwillingness to annexation. Well, Sir, that being the case, those Memorials were sent over here to the Colonial Office, and the Colonial Secretary has given a reply to them. In that reply, I understand the right hon. Gentleman threw away altogether this question of the proportions. I admitted last year that the Earl of Carnarvon stated that he would make the annexation dependent upon the consent of the majority; but when it was no longer possible to maintain it on that ground, it was thrown over, and the annexation was justified for other reasons. The prospect is very vague and uncertain, when you come to consider what is to be the future of your government of this country you have annexed; for you have 6,600 adult males out of a total population of 8,000 adult males, strongly protesting against annexation. The other ground on which the annexation is justified is stated to be that the weakness of the Transvaal was an encouragement to the Native tribes in the adjoining territories to assume a warlike attitude, not only to the Transvaal, but to the English Settlements. To those allegations the inhabitants of the Transvaal have given a very firm and, I confess, for my own part, I think, a very conclusive reply. I do not propose to go through it; but I wish I could persuade hon. Members to look through it, for I think then they would agree with me, that a strong case is made out against the position of those who advocated annexation. But that has reference to a point of policy which I do not wish now to re-open. I am still of opinion that that policy was wrong; but I desire now to go to the more practical question of what is now to be done. In 1852, the English Government, in a very solemn way, recognized the independence of the Boers of the Transvaal, and allowed them to manage their own affairs. That was not done rashly, but after a great amount of consideration of the policy to be adopted. I was looking the other day at a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), in 1852, in which he said—

> "Our policy in South Africa has been one of changes, as a sick man changes from side to side, in the endeavour to find relief."

In 1852, after a long period of vacillation, the Government of the Earl of Derby recognized the propriety of drawing the line in South Africa, and respecting the independence of those on the other side of the line, so as to keep a State interposed between ourselves and the uncivilized inhabitants of the territories beyond. That was recognized as our best policy, and was adopted until 1877, when it was entirely reversed. The Delegates who come before us now, bringing this protest from twelve-thirteenths of the inhabitants, wind up the Letter which they have sent to the Secretary of State by setting forth and protesting against divers grievances. They say—

> "We know that as a subject-people who have been deprived of their independence by such means, there will be before us many years of bitter heartburnings, of ill-feeling, of desertion of homes, and of wild and objectless wanderings; while, on the other hand, with justice > and with freedom, there is every reason to hope that the Transvaal may join hand-in-hand with the neighbouring States and Colonies to work together for mutual prosperity and happiness, and for the extension of civilization and Christianity into the far interior."

I beg to draw the attention of hon. Members to the future which these men hold out for the Transvaal. That is a future of which many of them have had a precisely similar experience, and the memory of it is fresh with them. They went into the Orange River Territory, and we followed them there; and they then went into the Transvaal, which we have now re-annexed. In reference to the prospect which this Memorial now holds out, as to still further emigration, I will read what Sir Harry Smith wrote to Earl Grey, 30 years ago, with regard to the Boers—

> "On my arrival at the foot of the Drachensberg Mountains, I was almost paralyzed to witness the whole of the population, with few exceptions, emigrating. Rains on this side of the mountains are tropical, and now prevail, and these families were exposed to a state of misery which I never before saw equalled, except in Massena's invasion of Portugal, when the whole of the population of that part of the seat of war abandoned their homes and fled—the scene here was truly heartrending."

That was 30 years ago, and the lads that then took part in that immigration are now the adult males of the Transvaal territory; while the younger men have had the story of that immigration told them and now realize the truth of it, and entertain feelings of animosity towards the English nation. They have now revived in them this grievance, for they have again the prospect of being driven out into the wilderness. If I could convey to hon. Members here anything of the impression which I have derived from intercourse with the inhabitants of the Transvaal territory, I think they would be impressed, as I have been, with the very serious nature of the future before these people. The Delegates have come here to appeal to your justice and your sense of humanity; but it does not appear that they have a very hopeful prospect, but will have to go back with feelings of gloom and of oppression. The gloom is caused by the thought of what may happen in the Transvaal if they are forced to leave that territory. They remember the anger and rage which was excited last year among their fellow Boers; and when they go back the same feeling of anger will be again excited, only to a greater extent. Probably they will resolve once more to take themselves unto the wilderness. These are men with whom it is difficult for us altogether to sympathize. Their education and their position are so entirely different from our own; they are so like our ancestors of many years ago. They are honest, healthy men—simple in manner and simple in their mode of life—resolved to go forth into the wilderness, if they must go, in defence of their rights. It struck me that a typical illustration of the tone of these men and of the two Delegates who have been sent over to England, was to be seen in the parting words addressed to those Delegates, that they might, like Joshua, the son of Nun—

> "Be strong and of a good courage, for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I sware unto them; and I will be with thee."

They have already received some grounds for apprehension; but I must read something more to enable the House to form a true idea of what the actual condition of the Transvaal now is. There has been another Memorial, I may mention, which has been drawn up in the Transvaal and laid before Parliament, coming from those who were strongly in favour of annexation. Most of the Memorialists were English settlers who had strayed over the Border, and who would make a considerable profit in the event of annexation. The Memorial is, therefore, from men who are not averse to British Sovereignty; but are strongly averse to the way in which British Sovereignty has been maintained. I will now read something to show what British Sovereignty in the Transvaal now is. The Memorial begins by saying—

> "Upon the faith of which [the Proclamation and Address of Sir Theophilus Shepstone of 12th April, 1877] and in order to avoid civil strife and confusion, many of your Petitioners assisted or acquiesced in the annexation and military occupation of the late Republic. . . . That it was distinctly promised to your Petitioners by Sir Theophilus Shepstone when he deprived them of their independence that in view of an alleged inherent weakness of the Republic, the British Government would afford the inhabitants of the State that security and protection which they were unable to obtain by themselves; that all legal Courts of Justice in existence at the time of the annexation should be continued; that the Transvaal should remain a separate Government with its own laws and Legislature; that the laws then in force should be retained until altered by competent legislative authority; that all private bonâ fide rights to property guaranteed by the late Government and all bonâ fide concessions and contracts should be honourably maintained and respected;"

And, furthermore—

"That, as soon as it might be convenient, some of Her Majesty's troops would enter this country, although they were not to do so to coerce the people; but to show those by whom they were surrounded that with the changes in the form of ruling the country, would also come a great and necessary accession of strength to enable Her Majesty's Government to discharge the obligations it had undertaken."

They go on to say—

"That in direct violation of the aforesaid promises, upon the strength of which the inhabitants of the late Republic were willing to give a peaceable trial to the new order of things, your Petitioners find that after twelve months' experience of the Government of Theophilus Shepstone, the following are among the most prominent of his breaches of faith:—That, in the first place, he has utterly failed to give to the people the promised protection against the Natives, and is even now compelled to call for Volunteers to do the work which ought to be done by the Imperial troops in the settlement of the still pending Secocoeni revolt, for the suppression of which it was stated that the mere entry of British troops into this country was sufficient. And your Petitioners say generally, as regards the Native question, that the present position of the country is far more critical than under the old régime. That, in violation of the promise to retain all legal Courts of Justice at the time of annexation, Sir Theophilus has, by arbitrary Proclamation, abolished the system of trial by jury as exemplified in the old Courts of Landdrost and Heemraden of this country, and instituted a new High Court and a totally unfamiliar system of legal procedure, administered under the supervision of only one Judge in place of a bench of three (as agreed upon by the late Government), and in disregard of the acceptance of office of a second, if not a third Judge; and your Petitioners further complain that the duties of the civil gaol officials and of the civil police, even on the floor of the High Court itself, have been usurped by the military authorities, under orders of the Administrator. That the Legislature (Volksraad) of this territory has been dissolved, and no deliberative Representative Assembly of any kind substituted for it, although promised in his Excellency's Proclamation of 12th April, 1877. That the laws of the country are being altered by mere Government Proclamation or Notice, and this without any prospect of the granting of any political Constitution to the country. That with reference to the promised non-coercion by the British troops or authorities, your Petitioners respectively complain that at a meeting which was held at Pretoria on the return of their Commissioners, Messrs. Paul Kruger and Jorissen, from Europe, certain artillery was trained upon the meeting, and the troops were held in readiness to overawe the meeting."

This is a Memorial, be it remembered, from those who are not disinclined to annexation, and it plainly shows that at present there exists in the Transvaal a system of despotism such as ought not to exist. It is a most material question for your consideration what you will do with the Transvaal if it is recognized as a necessity that the authorities should have despotic power, and that the Commissioner may, of his own free will, make and unmake laws and keep the whole country in subjection, and may dispose of the rights of property and liberties of the people, in what may be the well-considered determination of his own breast, but which may be but the mere result of a whim? That is the man who announced that the people of the Transvaal were not within their right in getting up a Memorial. It is the undoubted right of every competent person in a free State to memorialize the Government; but Sir Theophilus Shepstone warned the inhabitants of the Transvaal that they would be guilty of seditious acts if, in some Petition or other, they manifested their dissatisfaction with the annexation. The question for Her Majesty's Government to consider is, what will be the future of a country you have annexed, in which you find 6,600 adult males out of a population of 8,000 repudiating your authority, and your High Commissioner, so inflated with a sense of his position, that he is of his own will abolishing the legislative and financial systems, and bringing the whole country to such a state of irritation that it is only retained in your grasp by the power of the High Commissioner? If we conduct the government of a territory in that manner, it will inevitably become, not only a troublesome, but a most burdensome and most costly task. For the mere sake of economy, you must wish that the revenues of a country should pay for the costs of its government; but the condition into which you have reduced the Transvaal hardly renders that feasible at present. What would be the nature of the government of the Transvaal, even if all the inhabitants of the Transvaal were contented with it? Let hon. Members consider that problem. The extent of territory in the Transvaal is about the size of France, with a population of 8,000 adult males. They are so scattered about the country that, with the exception of a few villages and large parts containing about 200 inhabitants each, the farms are distant from one another 10, 20, or 30 miles. That is a country which can exist without almost any Government, if it is left alone. The Transvaal did so exist; and in the Memorial presented to the right hon. Gentleman, it is stated that for many years it practically existed without any Government. If undisturbed, all that has to be done in such a country is to keep order and repress robbery. And in a population of that kind the amount of disorder and robbery is not great. Those matters were easily looked after by the Boers, and the country practically existed without any Government at all. But if you take that country into your own hands and make it an English Colony, you have to give it a scientific form of government, and even if the inhabitants were perfectly willing subjects, you have to keep up an organization totally disproportionate to the end proposed. In fact, it would be impossible, on the part of any Government, to organize the government of this part of Africa according to English ideas, even if the inhabitants of the territory were willing to accept it. The United States, who have tried this sort of thing over and over again, would never have undertaken the task we have set ourselves in South Africa. You have sent out, as Commissioner, Mr. Sergeaunt, to make a Report upon the financial condition of the Transvaal. Where is the Report? It has not been laid before Parliament.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: That Report will be presented to Parliament with the next batch of Papers relating to the subject of the Transvaal.

Mr. COURTNEY: I am glad to hear that, because we shall then be able to estimate for ourselves what probability there is that the Colony will pay its own expenses. When it is before us, I am satisfied that it will show us that the government of the Colony must be exceedingly expensive; and, indeed, that it is impossible to govern the Transvaal out of its own resources, if you are going to govern it on the same footing as though it were an English Colony. And that would be the case, even if the people of the Transvaal were willing that you should govern, and lent you all the assistance in their power. But you have, on the contrary, the assurance that they are unwilling that you should govern them. Out of the 8,000 males in the territory, 6,600 have protested against your going there. On this point, let me read to you an extract from a pamphlet, which was printed for private circulation, which a friend—I do not quite know who, at this moment—sent me yesterday. It is a most admirable paper, and it contains the materials for a speech that was never delivered, collected by the late Sir William Molesworth, who devoted his great powers, in a large measure, to the consideration of the method of governing our Colonies, especially those of South Africa. In 1852, Sir William Molesworth did make a speech, in which he gave expression to some of the ideas set forth in this pamphlet; but these materials were collected for a speech which he conceived in 1854, and proposed to deliver in Parliament, in approbation of Lord Derby's policy of abandoning the Orange River Territory. In the course of his argument, he entered into the consideration of what would be the expense of governing that territory. In adverting to the probable cost of governing the Colony, he says—

> "When I consider that 100,000 warlike savages inhabit the mountain fastnesses of the Orange River Territory; that its frontier is open for 400 miles to the incursions of the Zoolahs, and other fierce Tribes of the great South African race; that there are, beyond the Vaal, 20,000 independent Boers, sympathizing with their 10,000 disaffected kinsmen in the Orange River Territory; when I reflect upon the difficulty of procuring succour from the distant military posts of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, I feel convinced that Sir George Cathcart has not over-estimated, at 2,000 men, the military force which would be required to retain possession of the Orange River Territory. I should also observe that this estimate was made by Sir George Cathcart before we had learnt, from experience, the surprising efficiency of the Basuto Cavalry, both in number and equipments. Let us next consider the cost of maintaining a body of 2,000 troops in the interior of South Africa. In addition to the ordinary military expenditure, we should have, in the first instance, to provide barracks for them. But building in the Orange River Territory is excessively expensive—three or four times as much as in this country—for the territory is destitute of materials for building, scarcely a stick of timber grows on it. The cheapest wood used is the Norway pine, which is brought 400 miles, from the nearest seaport, over a country without roads; and when buildings are erected, they soon become dilapidated, their walls decaying under the ravages of ants, which swarm in all the soil and through all the flooring. Secondly, we should have to import into the Orange River Territory all military stores, clothing, and every commodity required for the use of the soldiers, with the exception only of beef, mutton, and grain. The cost of conveying goods to the Orange River Territory is very great, for they have to be brought, either from Port Elizabeth or from the Cape of Good Hope, in waggons, each of them drawn by a span of 14 oxen. The journey from Port Elizabeth occupies, at least, six weeks, and from Cape Town, at least, two months. To add to the difficulty of these journeys, during the dry season, water near the road is scarce, and wood, either dry or green, sufficient to boil a camp-kettle, must, at all times, be carried for distances of several days' journey; and in seasons of drought, which are of common occurrence, the country is impassable. For instance, the surgeon in charge of a detatchment at Bloen Fontein was, for a year, very short of medicines, in consequence of the drought rendering the country so impassable that the periodical consignment of these supplies remained, for many months, at a distance of 150 miles, without a possibility of his getting them conveyed to Bloen Fontein. For these reasons, I am convinced that I have not overestimated, at £200,000 a-year, the cost of maintaining a body of 2,000 troops in the Orange River Territory; one-fourth of them to be Cavalry. At this rate of expenditure, the Orange River Territory would cost us about £20 per head per annum for every person of European descent in it; and about £400 per head, per annum, for every British settler. No wonder that these gentlemen, both store-keepers and land-jobbers, are so vehement in their assertions that the honour of England requires us to retain possession of the Orange River Territory. In all probability, the military expenditure would decuple their trade."

Now, that is just our position with regard to the Transvaal. These figures might apply equally well to that territory; and, indeed, the case of the Transvaal is even more striking, because that territory is further off than the Orange River Settlement, and the difficulty of governing it would be correspondingly greater. I ask—"How do you propose to work out the problem of governing the Transvaal from its own resources?" The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in his reply to the Delegates from the Transvaal, merely gave them the advice to return home, and keep quiet, and accept the situation. I have already shown the state of feeling in the Transvaal, and there is much to show that if the Delegates are dismissed with a few smooth words, while, practically, they obtain nothing, it will be difficult to appease those feelings, and to repress the disaffection, which we have good reason to believe exists throughout the territory. I have already admitted fully that if it is absolutely necessary to do so to protect ourselves, we are justified in annexing this territory by the doctrine which holds good in politics as well as in morals—that extreme necessity justifies all things. That doctrine, however, ought to be acted upon with extreme caution, because it involves the sacrifice of others for our own benefit; and if we are going to sacrifice the Transvaal for our own benefit, we should make some allowance for the feelings of the inhabitants, and stretch a point in their favour if we can possibly do so. When you compel a householder to give up possession of his house, you give him a bonus for turning him out; but in this case, when you take possession of territory against the will of the inhabitants, you appear to be willing to give them nothing but soft and empty words, and to do nothing to prevent the ripening of that danger, the elements of which at present exist in the Transvaal. I have myself seen the Delegates from that territory, and I confess that I was very much impressed by the way in which they stated the position in which they were placed. I asked them whether there was any possibility of coming to an agreement on this very important question; but they informed me that they had no authority to accept any terms of settlement, and that they had a difficulty in understanding why England should not withdraw from the steps which she had taken, and recognize the independence of the Transvaal. Of course, they have a difficulty in understanding that; but those who keep their minds free on this question must see that for us to withdraw the step, and to re-establish the independence of the Transvaal, would be scarcely practicable—and, indeed, I myself should almost shrink from recommending Her Majesty's Advisers to restore the independence of the Transvaal which has been taken away; but, at the same time, I think that we should give the Delegates some message which they might take back to those who sent them, which would remove the elements of disaffection to which I have alluded. We have told the inhabitants of this territory that we were obliged to undertake its control in order to maintain peace in South Africa, and we say that the misgovernment or the weak government of the Transvaal was a danger not only to themselves, but to us, which we were bound to guard against at any cost. Now, if we could take the necessary steps to insure peace in South Africa, and, at the same time, satisfy the aspirations of the inhabitants of the Transvaal for freedom and for self-government, I hope that we shall see gradually disappear from their minds the idea of a forcible attempt to re-assert their independence, which, at present, is undoubtedly simmering in the territory. The Delegates appeared to believe in the possibility of our recognizing their independence, and of our entering into an offensive and defensive alliance with them. That, of course, I feel is an impossibility. There is, however, a plan which appears to me to be worthy of consideration. We want to secure peace, and, at the same time, we ought to give the inhabitants as much freedom and self-government as possible. It occurs to me that something of this kind might be agreed upon. Why not say to these men who have been sent over to this country as Representatives of the Transvaal—"You are bent upon having your own institutions and self-government; but, at the same time, we must be protected against the danger which may spring from your quarrels with your neighbours, or with the Natives; and, therefore, we propose that troops under English command should be stationed at two or three points, where they would be able to operate most conveniently, and that the Transvaal should pay a certain proportion of the expense of keeping those troops, upon the understanding that the legitimate desire for freedom on the part of the inhabitants of that territory should be satisfied." We should not wish to throw the whole expense of keeping those troops upon the Transvaal, because they would be stationed in the territory not only for their own benefit, but for ours. Neither would it be necessary that those troops should consist of Her Majesty's Regular troops. They might be a force locally raised, but under the command of the Lord High Commissioner. If some proposal of this kind were made so that it might be discussed, we might fairly hope that the relations between this country and the Transvaal might be placed on such a footing, that while we might be secured against all the danger which was apprehended, the inhabitants of the territory might, at the same time, be made contensed with their position. If the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies were to say a word in this direction to the Delegates before they depart, which would give those who sent them a fair hope that local autonomy would be conceded, things might easily be put straight, and the inhabitants might be satisfied; but to send the Delegates back with no more than the Letter before us will be to prepare a great deal of trouble for ourselves in the future. I cannot help thinking that some plan of this kind might be adopted, and that it would lead to excellent results. I am bound, however, to say that there is another consideration that we cannot overlook. You have at present as Special Commissioner and Administrator of the Government of the Transvaal, Sir Theophilus Shepstone. Sir Theophilus Shepstone is described as being an indispensable man. But he has been discredited by his actions in that part of the world, as no public man has been discredited before, upon questions involving precisely the same issue as those before us; and it was he who pursuaded Lord Carnarvon to adopt the line of policy which led to the annexation of the Transvaal. I have heard it said that an indispensable man is one who ought to be at once dispensed with; and my opinion is, that unless you get rid of Sir Theophilus Shepstone, you will have no peace in South Africa. This is the man who is raising the passions which are making their presence felt in the Transvaal. In the Notice of Motion which I gave yesterday, I stated that it was my intention to conclude with a Motion to the effect that it is desirable that steps should be taken to restore local autonomy in the Transvaal Territory. That Motion does not appear in the Paper today; but by way of putting upon record my views on this subject, I propose, if it is in accordance with the Rules of the House; to make a Motion, although, of course, I shall not put the House to the trouble of dividing upon the question. I, therefore, beg to conclude by moving—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that steps shall be taken to restore local autonomy to the Transvaal."

Mr. SPEAKER: As the Question before the House is the adjournment of the House, no Amendment can be moved, except one having reference to the time at which the House shall meet.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I quite admit that a question of this importance is one that ought to be discussed in this House, and I also freely acquit the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) of all blame in not bringing forward this subject at an earlier period of the Session. But I think that he has trespassed to a great extent upon the patience and the forbearance of the House by the manner in which he has brought this subject under their notice. I do, however, trust that what has passed this evening will have this good effect—that it will convince those gentlemen who are now in this country as Delegates from the Transvaal, that even at this period of the Session, and under existing circumstances, the House of Commons, or at least that portion of it which is left in London, is willing to give to their case the best possible attention. The hon. Member for Liskeard appears to have based all his argument upon the objection he has always entertained to the annexation of the Transvaal. But that matter was fully discussed, and was finally decided, last year; and it seems to me that it was not only unnecessary, but even absolutely mischievous, that it should be again raised this evening by the hon. Member. In my judgment, the greater portion of his speech can only have the effect of exciting hopes in the minds of the Delegates and of those whom they represent which it is utterly wrong to excite, because it is absolutely impossible that they can be gratified. And the line that the hon. Member for Liskeard has taken is the more to be deprecated, because, not only does he know perfectly well that when the question of the annexation of the Transvaal was discussed, he was one of the very few hon. Members in this House who did not agree in the wisdom and propriety of that policy; but he must also be aware that if he were now to propose that we should recede from the policy we have pursued, he would scarcely find another hon. Member who would agree with him on the subject. It has been admitted, almost unanimously, that the annexation of the Transvaal was a necessary step for us to take. I entirely agree that it is a step which entailed a grave and serious responsibility upon this country, which ought not to have been taken, unless it was absolutely necessary, and which we did take most reluctantly. I freely admit that there are difficulties before us in the matter, though I think that they have been exaggerated by the hon. Member for Liskeard—if, indeed, some have not been entirely invented by those from whom he derived his information. In the first place, I must say that there was nothing whatever in Lord Carnarvon's expression of opinion last year, either in "another place," or in his conversations with the Delegates from the Transvaal, which could justify the latter in assuming that the question of the annexation of that territory could be submitted to a vote of the majority of the people. The Delegates, however, appear to have conveyed that impression on their return; but it was utterly without foundation; and it is to be regretted that they had not a little more moral courage, and did not state what they must have known was the case—that the question of annexation was one which had been decided by Lord Carnarvon, and could not be re-opened. That decision of Lord Carnarvon met with the practically unanimous approval of the people of this country; and any idea that the annexation was to be subject to the popular vote of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, or could be affected by signatures to a Memorial, was one which Lord Carnarvon could not have entertained for a moment. The Delegates, as the hon. Member for Liskeard says, have returned to this country with this Memorial. That is the sole new fact in the case. In my reply to the Memorial, I stated some reasons to which the hon. Member for Liskeard did not refer, to show why I was unable to attach the importance which the Delegates did to the number of signatures to that Memorial. The hon. Member has animadverted upon the line of action taken by Sir Theophilus Shepstone, and upon the terms of the Proclamation which he issued. It is not my office to defend the grammar of the Proclamation, or even the precise terms in which it is couched; but I must say that, looking at the condition of the whole of South Africa at the time, and at the danger of disturbance on the frontiers, I think that Sir Theophilus Shepstone was justified in adopting the principles of action upon which his Proclamation is based, and the result was, that certain persons to whom the Proclamation was addressed saw the danger of the course they were pursuing, and desisted from it. Well, the Memorial was signed, as the hon. Member states, by a considerable number of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, and it has been brought over to this country and has been presented to me, and I have replied to it in the Letter which is now upon the Table of the House. I do not want to go through the Letter, neither do I wish upon this occasion to re-open the whole history of our South African Colonies. In that Letter, however, I felt it to be my duty to enter into the arguments which the Delegates brought forward in support of their request for the re-establishment of the independence of the Transvaal. I will only say, with regard to this matter, that when the hon. Member for Liskeard refers to the policy which was adopted in 1852, and suggests that it should be reverted to, that the events which have occurred since then have most clearly proved that that policy was wrong and dangerous, and it is for that reason that it was reversed by my Predecessor in Office last year. The hon. Member for Liskeard appeared to suggest that it was possible that the people of the Transvaal should be, what he calls, left to themselves. But the result of adopting such a course was the condition of things that was fully discussed last year, and which was well known to the House. The hon. Member says of my reply that it does nothing but advise, in vague and smooth words, the people of the Transvaal to be quiet. I will just venture to read to the House the last two paragraphs of that reply, because I think they will show that I have not met this request on the part of the Delegates from the Transvaal by empty words; but have expressed my anxiety that, as far as possible, the policy which we have adopted, and which the hon. Member himself appears to think must now be followed, shall be carried out in a manner that will conduce to the prosperity and to the welfare of the Colony. I say—

> "I gladly leave this subject in order to assure you of the warm interest felt by Her Majesty's Government in the moral and material welfare of the Transvaal, and their desire to promote it by every means in their power. I am anxious to secure your co-operation, and that of those on whose behalf you have addressed me, in an endeavour to arrive at some full and satisfactory understanding respecting the future of your country; and especially as to the principles upon which it may be possible to base a Constitutional and Administrative system which may preserve many of the most valued institutions of the Transvaal, under the protection and supervision afforded by the Queen's Sovereignty.
> "The people of the Province were clearly informed by Sir Theophilus Shepstone, in his Proclamation, that 'the Transvaal would remain a separate Government, with its own Laws and Legislature; and that it was the wish of Her Most Gracious Majesty that it should enjoy the fullest legislative privileges compatible with the circumstances of the country and the intelligence of its people.' You are aware that the present system of government, though continued, in consequence of the unsettled state of the country, for a longer term than had been contemplated, is altogether temporary and provisional."

The hon. Member has referred to the personal action of Sir Theophilus Shepstone. I do not intend now to enter upon the particular charges which are contained in passages which he has quoted from the Memorial addressed, not to me, but to Sir Bartle Frere, and which the latter believes to be entirely without foundation. I am at present merely dealing with the opinions which I have myself expressed. I go on to say—

> "It is the desire of Her Majesty's Government that no time shall be lost in carrying out the promises given in the Proclamation, so as to satisfy the wishes of those who deprecate any avoidable departure from the old Constitution of the country; whether it will be in their power to proceed at once with that policy depends in a great measure upon you, and upon all over whom you have influence. I earnestly recommend you, and those on whose behalf you act, to turn your attention from that which is impossible to those much-needed reforms and undertakings on the necessity of which all are agreed, and to co-operate loyally and heartily with Her Majesty's Government in concerting such measures as may make the Transvaal a prosperous, contented, and self-supporting country."

If I were to emulate the length of the hon. Member's speech, I could say nothing more than is included in the words I have read. It was necessary, for reasons fully stated last year, to extend the Sovereignty of the Queen over this territory. It is necessary to retain control over the Native policy there pursued—that necessity exists in the interest of the whole of South Africa—I may say, in the interest of the whole of the White and Native races. But, saving Imperial questions, and matters directly connected with them, I am as anxious as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard can be, that the people of the Transvaal shall manage their own affairs. I will devote—indeed, I have already devoted—much serious consideration to the manner in which that may best be done. I have instructed Sir Bartle Frere to visit that part of South Africa, and, in concert with Sir Theophilus Shepstone, to suggest to me a mode by which that object may be carried out; and I will only say, in conclusion, that if the Delegates, when they return to the Transvaal, will co-operate with the Government here, and with the Government in South Africa, in regard to this matter, they will find that, subject to the points which I have named, it is our great anxiety to deal with them and with their country so as to give them, as fully as possible, that self-government which they desire.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT—HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

The PARLIAMENT was this day prorogued by Commission.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that Her Majesty had been pleased to grant two several Commissions, one for declaring Her Royal Assent to several Acts agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament, and the other for proroguing the Parliament:—And the LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR; The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of Richmond and Gordon); The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Duke of Northumberland); The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Marquess of Hertford); and The LORD SKELMERSDALE—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form between the Throne and the Woolsack; and the COMMONS being come, with their Speaker, and the Commission to that purpose being read, the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR, pursuant to Her Majesty's Command, delivered HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"WHEN, in a critical condition of public affairs, you assembled at the commencement of the year, I pointed out to you that, in the interests of my Empire, precautions might become necessary, for which I appealed to your liberality to provide. At the same time I assured you that no efforts in the cause of peace should be wanting on my part.

"Your response was not ambiguous, and contributed largely to a pacific solution of the difficulties which then existed. The terms of agreement between Russia and the Porte, so far as they affected pre-existing Treaties, were, after an interval of discussion, submitted to a Congress of the Powers; and their councils have resulted in a peace which I am thankful to believe is satisfactory and likely to be durable. The Ottoman Empire has not emerged from a disastrous war without severe loss; but the arrangements which have been made, while favourable to the subjects of the Porte, have secured to it a position of independence which can be upheld against aggression.

"I have concluded a Defensive Convention with the Sultan, which has been laid before you. It gives, as regards his Asiatic Empire, a more distinct expression to the engagements which in principle I, together with other Powers, accepted in 1856, but of which the form has not been found practically effectual. The Sultan has, on the other hand, bound himself to adopt and carry into effect the measures necessary for securing the good government of those Provinces. In order to promote the objects of this Agreement, I have undertaken the occupation and administration of the Island of Cyprus.

"In aiding to bring about the settlement which has taken place, I have been assisted by the discipline and high spirit of my Forces by sea and by land, by the alacrity with which my Reserves responded to my call, by the patriotic offers of military aid by my people in the Colonies, and by the proud desire of my Indian Army to be reckoned among the defenders of the British Empire, a desire justified by the soldierly qualities of the force recently quartered at Malta.

"The spontaneous offers of troops made by many of the Native Governments in India were very gratifying to me, and I recognise in them a fresh manifestation of that feeling towards my Crown and Person which has been displayed in many previous instances.

"My relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be friendly.

"Although the condition of affairs in South Africa still affords some ground for anxiety, I have learnt with satisfaction from the reports of my civil and military officers that the more serious disturbances which had arisen among the native population on the frontiers of the Cape Colony are now terminated.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the liberal supplies which you have voted for the public service.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The Act which has been passed for amending and greatly simplifying the law relating to Factories and Workshops will, I trust, still further secure the health and education of those who are employed in them.

"I have had much pleasure in giving my assent to a measure relating to the Contagious Diseases of Cattle, which, by affording additional securities against the introduction and spread of those diseases, will tend to encourage the breeding of live stock in the country and to increase the supply of food to my people.

"You have amended the Law as to Highways in a manner which cannot but improve their classification and management, and at the same time relieve inequalities in the burden of their maintenance.

"I trust that advantage will be taken of the means which you have provided for dividing Bishoprics in the more populous districts of the country, and thus increasing the efficiency of the Church.

"I anticipate the best results from the wise arrangements which you have made for the encouragement of intermediate education in Ireland.

"The measure for amending and consolidating the Public Health Laws in that country is well calculated to promote the important object at which it aims.

"The measure passed in regard to Roads and Bridges in Scotland and for the abolition of Tolls will greatly improve the management of highways in that part of the United Kingdom; while the Acts relating to Education and to Endowed Schools and Hospitals cannot fail to extend the benefits of education and improve the administration of charitable endowments in that country.

"In bidding you farewell, I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may rest on your recent labours and accompany you in the discharge of all your duties."

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Saturday the second day of November next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Saturday the second day of November next.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—THE ROSTER FOR MEDICAL OFFICERS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be the fact, and if so why is it, that the roster for Medical Officers has, since 1873, been kept as a private document, which officers are not allowed to see in the same manner as customary between 1858 and 1873; and, whether he is prepared to place Medical Officers on a footing, as regards exchanges, similar to that on which the other branches of the service now stand?

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Committee appointed to inquire into matters affecting the Medical Department has reported, and when such Report will be circulated; if he will state if there is any objection to a system of open and unconditional exchange, such as exists in the combatant branches of the Army, being allowed to prevail in the Medical Department, and why the old system of keeping a public roster for Foreign Service has been abandoned; and, whether he will order a roster to be kept, either at the Adjutant General's Office or at the Office of the Director General of the Medical Department, which shall be open to inspection by all members of the Department?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, the roster for medical officers was, up to the time of the late Director General of the Army Medical Department—that is to say, 1873—hung up in the waiting-room of the Department, in accordance with the regulations of 1859; but it was found that this practice led to various abuses, consequent upon Army exchange agents and other persons coming and inspecting the roster, and then writing letters to the officers who were likely to be concerned. That led to abuses, and it was, therefore, removed from the waiting-room, and was kept in the office of the Surgeon General of the Medical Department; but it is open to the inspection of any officer, and any officer can ascertain his place upon it by application by letter to the Surgeon General. The Committee appointed to inquire into the Medical Department have reported, and I trust to lay their Report upon the Table as soon as the House meets next Session. I believe it will be in a completed state, and fit for Parliamentary publication, by that time. I have further to say, that my own personal wish is to see exchange among medical officers made as free as it can be, compatible with the interests of the Service; but I am bound to point out that, in the other Departments, it can never be so entirely unrestricted as in the combatant branches, and I am not prepared offhand to say it could be entirely assimilated to the system which exists in the combatant branches. That, I think, answers the Questions of both my hon. Friends, and that is all that I am in a position to say at the moment.

TURKEY—THE PAPERS.

QUESTION.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the document named at page 98 of "Turkey, 1878, No. 42," will be published?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the document referred to had not been published with the last batch of Papers, because it was not dated. It would, however, be in the hands of hon. Members in a very few days.

CENTRAL ASIA AND AFGHANISTAN.

QUESTION.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any objection to the publication of Papers relating to negotiations on the affairs of Central Asia and Afghanistan which may have taken place between England and Russia since the publication of the Papers of 1874?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, that there was no objection, and that they would be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION—REFORMS IN ASIA MINOR.

QUESTION.

Mr. E. JENKINS said, he wished to put a Question, either to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whichever might be most convenient, and in order to have an opportunity of explaining his Question, he would conclude with a Motion. There was a telegram in one of that morning's papers to this effect—

> "That the difficulties which have arisen between Turkey and England in reference to the introduction of reforms in Asia Minor have been almost entirely removed. Sir Austen Layard has abandoned some of his demands which had been objected to by the Porte. The latter declared that the Treaty respecting Cyprus did not imply the renunciation by Turkey of her independence. Turkey would listen to the counsels of England, but would undertake the reforms herself, without there being any necessity for the installation in Asia Minor of British residents, who would seek to introduce reforms, instead of merely watching for their execution."

Now, with reference to certain declarations which had been made from the front Bench regarding the meaning of the Convention, and the assertion that it was not intended on the part of Her Majesty's Government to be a sham, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman Whether this was true—that the Porte had practically refused to give any material guarantees with reference to good government and the reforms to be introduced in Asiatic Turkey; and whether, therefore, the objections that were taken on that—the Opposition—side of the House, that the Paper Convention of June 4 was not a real guarantee, were not sustained by the fact that it had no effective guarantee in it to enable the British Government to say that the reforms which it was to insist upon would be carried out? He wished also to ask, Whether any information had been received from Sir Austen Layard which confirmed the telegram which he had read; and whether, supposing that the matter was arranged in the interval of the Recess, Her Majesty's Government would make public the arrangement which had been entered into between the Government and Turkey. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, he had not seen the telegram referred to; but, as he understood it, it gave a totally different opinion of the state of affairs from that implied in the interpretation which had been given of it by the hon. Member. All he could state on the subject was that negotiations were going on between Sir Austen Layard and the Porte, and that when those negotiations had reached the point at which it would be desirable to publish the communications, Her Majesty's Government would have no objection to that being done.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS.—QUESTION.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD: I take this opportunity of asking, Whether the statement in the "Daily News" this morning with regard to the health of the troops at Cyprus is correct or not, because, according to that account, the state of the troops is very alarming? The fever seems to be very extensive indeed, and it would seem that the troops are cantoned in places which must necessarily be unhealthy. It would appear to those who, like myself, perhaps, know very little about the matter, that instead of making an old place like Nicosia the military centre and capital of the Island, it would be better to commence in a new place altogether, where there was no fever such as seems to be so very prevalent there. I wish to know, whether there is any foundation for the very alarming statement of the "Daily News?"

Colonel STANLEY: Sir, in reply to Questions which were put to me two days ago, it was then my duty to state that a telegram received from Sir Garnet Wolseley contained the announcement that the sickness was about 6 per cent of the men in hospital, mostly for fever of a mild type. I have since then had telegrams about various other matters of business, and there has been no reference, except in one of them, to any further increase of sickness. I may also say that letters, both public and private, which I have had, although they refer to cases of fever being undoubtedly very numerous, speak of them as of a comparatively mild type, although some of them, no doubt, been complicated by sunstroke, owing to the intense heat. There has been, so far as we are aware, only three deaths since our troops first landed in Cyprus, and in a telegram which came to hand this morning, about other matters, there are words which certainly do not appear very clear, but which undoubtedly imply that such sickness as there has been is on the decrease. I can only say that it is as much a puzzle to me as it is to some hon. Members, the discrepancy between the official and the private accounts which I receive and the accounts which appear in some organs of the daily Press. I am not saying we can have absolute knowledge on the subject. I can only give the House that knowledge which I possess, and watch the question as carefully as possible. I may add that upon the earliest indications of there being an increase of sickness, we took the precaution of placing six doctors under orders to go out, and those officers either have sailed or are on the point of sailing.

SPAIN—CASE OF GEORGE WHITE.
QUESTION.

Captain PIM: Sir, I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question, of which I have given him private Notice. It is to ask him, If he will be kind enough to telegraph at once to the Consul General at Havannah in reference to the case of George White, the British sailor, about whose imprisonment there I put a Question to him yesterday? I can only say that it would be an act of great kindness to allay the anxiety of his friends and relations at Gravesend.

Mr. BOURKE: In answer to my hon. and gallant Friend, I can only say that I will consult my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, and if he has no objection, I will telegraph as my hon. and gallant Friend desires.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CORONERS BILL.—[Bill 303.]

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General)

SECOND READING. ORDER DISCHARGED. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged, said, he would take that opportunity of stating that if he succeeded in getting the measure sent before a Select Committee next year, he would bring before that Committee the question of the election of Coroners.

Motion agreed to.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

MAGISTRATES (SUMMARY JURISDICTION) BILL.—[Bill 304.]

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING. ORDER DISCHARGED. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged, said, he wished to call attention to a matter which appeared to involve considerable hardship. The magistrates throughout the country seemed to be under the impression that the Small Penalties Act was to be put in force in every case—that, in short, they looked upon it as a matter of course that the Act should be put in force—whereas it was optional whether they should put it in force or not. There was no doubt that under this erroneous impression a great many persons had been brought under the operation of the Act who would not have been so brought under its operation, if the magistrates had exercised their discretion in the matter.

Mr. HOPWOOD said, the matter referred to by the right hon. Gentleman was a great grievance and mischief, and it was a great disappointment that there had not been time to pass the Bill. He hoped it would be re-introduced sufficiently early next Session.

Motion agreed to.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

NAVY—H.M.S. "VANGUARD."

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. D. Jenkins,

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he was sorry to say that he had no very satisfactory information to give the House with regard to the raising of the Vanguard. As far as he could see, the contractor had not made progress with the necessary arrangements for raising that ship. They had been told from time to time that the contractor was building lighters for that purpose; but he (Mr. W. H. Smith) had no evidence that he was really doing so, and it was to be feared that when the 31st of October came the Vanguard would be found remaining where she was at the present moment.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend The Lords Commissioners:—

The House went;—and a Royal Commission to that purpose having been read, the Royal Assent was given to several Bills.

And afterwards Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech was delivered to both Houses of Parliament by the Lord High Chancellor (in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command).

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Saturday the 2nd day of November next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Saturday the 2nd day of November next.

GENERAL INDEX TO SESSION 1878.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

It being a principal object of this Index, that the proceedings on each Motion shall be completely recorded, some abbreviations of forms were necessary. Those who are accustomed to the proceedings of Parliament will readily fill up the voids. Those who are not so familiar, may find the following explanation useful, but will find the whole formulæ set out at length in the "Contents."

The names which immediately follow the title of a Bill are those of the Peers or hon. Members who have charge of the Bill.

The numbers which are added at stages of Bills are the official numbers of the prints and reprints ordered at each stage, and, with the Statute, will enable the reader to follow all the changes the Bill has undergone.

The entries—Moved, "That the Bill be now read $2^a$;" Amendt. "this day six months;" Question put, "That 'now,' &c."—indicate the usual form of raising the issue—namely, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

"The Ballot, Amendt. on Committee of Supply" indicates that the Question was raised by means of an Amendment moved on the Motion (after the Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee of Supply had been read), "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." In this case the issue is formally raised by the Motion "To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add" other words. The decision is taken on the Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The Nos. added to the "Parliamentary Papers" are in most cases those given in the Commons' "List of Papers for Sale."

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

PARLIAMENT
Business of the House
Private Members and Official Members—As regards the Business of the House, there is no distinction between private Members and official Members, [242] 392
Saturday Sittings—Mr. Speaker is not prepared, off-hand, to say whether there is any precedent for holding a Sitting on Saturday solely for the consideration of a Bill other than a Government Bill. And Mr. Speaker refers to the rights of Members in regard to private Bills, [242] 1640
Adjournment of the House—It has been the general practice that a Motion for the adjournment of the House should take precedence of other Business, [240] 1076

The 12.30 Rule—The application for Leave to bring in a Bill being in form a Motion before the House is, like every other Motion, subject to Amendment. Therefore a Notice of Amendment on a Motion for Leave brings the Bill within the operation of the Rule with regard to not taking opposed Business after half-past 12 o'clock, [237] 1538

Strangers—Notice being taken, That Strangers were present—Mr. Speaker said, he should follow the course which he had previously taken on similar occasions, and forthwith put the Question, "That Strangers be ordered to withdraw;" but no second Teller being named for the Ayes, Mr. Speaker declared that the Noes had it, [240] 478

The Ladies Gallery—Mr. Speaker informs the House of the course he has usually taken with respect to the admission of ladies to the Ladies Gallery when the discussion of a delicate question is likely to take place, [240] 480

DIVISIONS

Mr. Sullivan and Mr. O'Connor Power stating that they had inadvertently gone into the wrong Lobby, and that their votes had been counted contrary to their intention—Mr. Speaker said, that there was no mode by which the record of the vote could be altered. Both the hon. Members having been in the House when the Question was put, the result of their votes must be recorded as they were given, [242] 1814

On a Division on Blind and Deaf-Mute Children (Education) Bill, the numbers being equal, Mr. Speaker declares his reason for voting with the Noes, [242] 1712

ORDER

Debate

Disorderly Interruption of Debate — Major O'Gorman, having frequently in a disorderly manner interrupted the Secretary of State for War, who was speaking in debate, was called to Order by Mr. Speaker; and having declined to submit to the authority of the Chair, Mr. Speaker called upon Major O'Gorman by his name. Who, on the morrow, expressing his regret and offering an apology to the House, Mr. Speaker said, that if it should be the wish of the House to proceed no further in the matter, it would be an agreeable duty on his part to declare the will of the House in favour of indulgence, [242] 1380, 1438

Un-Parliamentary Language—Mr. Lowe: The thing appears to have been done merely to see how many falsehoods could be put into a despatch—["Order!"]—Mr. Speaker said, that if the observation was intended to apply to any Member of this House, it was, of course, un-Parliamentary, [242] 879

Un-Parliamentary Language—Reflection on a foreign Sovereign—Lord Robert Montagu, applying the word "tyrant" to the Emperor of Russia, and using other expressions reflecting upon that Sovereign, and stating that the conduct of the Emperor was "applauded by hypocritical lovers of liberty in this House"—the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to Order——Mr. Speaker said, the language employed by the noble Lord was not respectful to a Sovereign who is an ally and friendly to this country. It is also out of Order to attribute motives to Members of this House by calling them "hypocritical," and called upon the noble Lord to withdraw the expressions complained of, [237] 1639; see also [238] 799

Un-Parliamentary Language—Reflections on a Judge—Mr. O'Connor Power having, in the course of observations on the judicial conduct of Mr. Justice Keogh, described him as "a gentleman permitted to occupy a seat on the Judicial Bench who is nothing more than a political and religious firebrand"—Mr. Walpole rose to Order. Mr. Speaker said: I am bound to say that, in my judgment, the expression used by the hon. Member for Mayo is improper, and I consider that such an expression should be withdrawn. It appears to me that when it is proposed to call in question the conduct of a Judge, the Member desiring to do so should take that Constitutional course which is laid down, and move an Address to the Crown, [238] 1953

Un-Parliamentary Language—Dr. O'Leary—Weighing the merits of the question, and considering the effect of the public acts of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) on the negotiations of this country with other countries, he should say they had been of a most "damnable character." Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member has used a most un-Parliamentary expression, and I must beg him to withdraw it, [238] 1192

Un-Parliamentary Language—Imputations on Members—The observations of the hon. Member, imputing misconduct to hon. Members of this House, and stating that personal squabbles are carried on in this House, are unbecoming; and Mr. Speaker said, he must call upon the hon. Member to be more careful in his expressions, [240] 934

Un-Parliamentary Language—Imputations on Members—Mr. Parnell said, "That was a legal quibble, worthy of the hon. and learned Member from whom it proceeded." Mr. Speaker said the expression was unwarrantable, and should be withdrawn, [239] 1405

Un-Parliamentary Language—An hon. Member in imputing disloyalty to any Member of this House would, no doubt, be out of Order, [237] 179; see also [240] 546

Un-Parliamentary Language—Mr. O'Donnell, having used certain expressions respecting the late Earl of Leitrim, and confusion arising — Mr. Speaker said, the language the hon. Member has addressed to the House is, no doubt, to be deprecated as being very strong; but, at the same time, I am not prepared to say that he is not within his right in using the expressions in question, [239] 1261

[cont.

Un-Parliamentary Language—Sir Wilfrid Lawson: Forty-eight hours afterwards they heard that all the savages and cut-throats of India had been brought to Malta—["Order!"]—Mr. Speaker: I am bound to say that the expression is not becoming; but, at the same time, I am not in a position to call upon the hon. Baronet to withdraw it as being un-Parliamentary, [242] 1092

Premature discussion of a Subject—The hon. Member has already given Notice that he will bring this matter (Accidents in Mines) under the consideration of the House; and although he has not fixed any day for that purpose, I am bound to say that, under these circumstances, his observations are now altogether irregular, [238] 1492; [239] 1249; [242] 1443

Premature discussion of a Bill, [241] 807

Premature discussion of Clauses—In moving that a Bill be now read the second time, to go through the Bill clause by clause was anticipating the work of Committee, [237] 1593

Right of Reply—A Member who has moved an Amendment has no right of reply, [240] 1527

Speaking a second time—A Member who has seconded the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, is not entitled to speak again in that debate, [237] 1532; [240] 123; [241] 1311

Nor to move an Amendment, [237] 408

When no Motion before the House—There being no Motion before the House, an hon. Member is not in Order in attempting to address the House, [240] 1611

An hon. Member proposing to offer observations when no Motion before the House, and being called to Order, said, he would put himself in Order by concluding with a Motion. Mr. Speaker said, he had on several occasions pointed out the great inconvenience resulting from the practice of hon. Members, who were not satisfied with the Answers given to their Questions, rising to move the adjournment of the House, [237] 1539; [238] 1951; [241] 130

Explanation—Limitation of Explanation, [239] 523; [240] 515; [241] 332; [242] 1709

Questions—Limitation of Answer—An hon. Member must keep within the limits of an Answer to the Question that has been put to him. He is not entitled to enter on a discussion as to the merits of the Question, [240] 1617; [241] 964

Limitation of Observations, [240] 360

Relevancy of Observations, [238] 214, 362, 1976; [239] 535, 1098, 1232, 1404, 1408, 1410, 1418; [240] 759, 760; [241] 1314, 1697; [242] 1696, 1700, 1716, 1719, 1779, 1805

Relevancy of a Question, [239] 1723

Supply—Relevancy to Vote, [240] 347

[cont.

Repetition of Argument—Mr. Speaker: I have to remind the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) that he has repeated the same argument over and over again, and that he is thus trying very severely the forbearance of the House, [240] 1662

Reference to proceedings of a Select Committee—An hon. Member would not be in Order in referring to the proceedings of a Committee whose Report is not yet before the House, [238] 802

Reading from newspapers, &c.—An hon. Member would not be out of Order in reading from an article on which he proposed to found a Motion, [240] 1069

It is not regular to refer in debate to articles in newspapers which reflect upon the proceedings of the House, [241] 831

BILLS

Motion for Leave—An application for Leave to bring in a Bill is in the form of a Motion before the House, and every Motion is subject to Amendment, [237] 1538

Alterations in a Bill after Leave given—Leave having been given to Sir George Balfour to introduce a Bill on the subject of Hypothec, which was then presented and read the first time. On Motion, "That the Bill be now read the second time," it was found that the print differed from the Bill introduced. Mr. J. Lowther objected. Mr. Speaker said, he had noticed that some material alterations had been made in the Bill. Hon. Members might make clerical or verbal alterations in Bills; but it would not be in Order for an hon. Member to move the second reading of a Bill which, although bearing the same title, differed materially and substantially from the measure which he obtained leave to introduce. The course for the hon. Member to pursue was to withdraw the Order for the second reading of the Bill, and to ask leave to introduce a Bill in substitution for it, [237] 362

Printing and Distribution of Bills — It is the duty of an hon. Member who obtains leave to introduce a Bill, and who fixes the second reading for a particular day, to have the Bill printed: if that has not been done, it is a good reason for the postponement of the second reading

It is the constant practice of the House for Members in charge of Bills to be allowed to postpone the different stages of those Bills as unopposed Motions, [240] 859

Mr. Monk inquired whether it was not a matter of necessity that the Bill (Public Works Loans Bill) should be in the hands of hon. Members before the Second Reading was moved? Mr. Speaker said, no doubt it would be more convenient if hon. Members had the Bill in their hands; but he was not prepared to say that the right hon. Gentleman was out of Order in moving the second reading, [239] 609

Discussion of Bills—The Question before the House being that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be read and discharged, an hon. Member has a right to discuss the subject-matter of the Bill, [239] 1590

On a Motion for the postponement of the second reading of a Bill, it is not competent for an hon. Member to discuss the merits of the Bill itself, [240] 858

Two Bills on the same subject, and identically the same, having been put down on the Order Book for the same day, Mr. Speaker declared the proceeding to be irregular—that whatever course the House might think proper to take with reference to the Bill then before the House, the other Bill should certainly be withdrawn, [240] 459

Money Bills—A clause involving a question of compensation imposing a charge upon the public cannot be put from the Chair unless it has been considered by a Committee of the Whole House upon the Bill, [241] 1301

Money Clauses—Mr. Speaker points out that certain clauses proposed to be inserted in the Highways Bill being money clauses ought to have been moved in Committee of the Whole House, [242] 196

Money Clauses—A Resolution providing compensation in respect of cattle slaughtered under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill "out of the local rates or the Consolidated Fund" required to be amended:—the words "or the Consolidated Fund" should be omitted, and the words "monies to be provided by Parliament" inserted instead, [241] 1591

Money Bills—Mr. Speaker pointed out that although with respect to Bills other than Money Bills two stages of a Bill were occasionally taken at one Sitting on grounds of urgency, there was no instance of this course being taken with regard to Money Bills, [239] 1419

COMMITTEES

Instructions to Committee—Factories and Workshops Bill—Order for Committee read: Mr. Fawcett moved, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert in the Bill provisions for regulating the hours of labour, and securing the attendance at school of children employed in agriculture." Mr. Goldney objected that an Instruction of that nature was not germane to a Bill "for the regulation of factories and workshops." Mr. Speaker said, that the Committee would not have power to deal with the question unless an Instruction of this kind be passed: Mr. Speaker saw no objection in point of Order to the Instruction proposed to be moved, [238] 63

According to the usual course, the Member in charge of a Bill names the time for its consideration as amended. To move that the Order be discharged in the absence of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill might cause the greatest inconvenience, and is a proceeding which should never be taken without Notice, [240] 1675

SUPPLY

Supply—The Committee of Supply can only be fixed by a Minister of the Crown, and, according to the Standing Order, the Committee of Supply must be fixed for Monday, Wednesday, or Friday. It might, however, be open to any hon. Member, when the Government has given Notice of their intention to take Supply on a particular day, to move, as an Amendment, that some other day should be substituted, [240] 1669

Supply—It is contrary to the Standing Orders of the House that Supplies should be proposed unless recommended by the Ministers of the Crown, [240] 1663

Supply—An hon. Member is not entitled to discuss a Vote already taken; nor under cover of a communication to advert to a Vote passed in this House, [240] 841

Adjournment of the House—The Question before the House being the adjournment of the House no Amendment can be moved, except one having reference to the time at which the House shall meet, [242] 2076

Amendments—An Amendment not being seconded cannot be put, [239] 431

Amendments—An Amendment being before the House, no other Amendment can be moved until that has been disposed of, [240] 1598

An Amendment had already been put to the House which appeared to deal with the question, and therefore another Amendment to the same purpose could not be put, [241] 829

On Consideration of Lords Amendments to a Bill, the whole Bill cannot be discussed, but only such Amendments as the Lords have made in it, [241] 846, 1059

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question"—resolved in the affirmative. After the vote of the House no other Amendment can be moved; the Question is, that the Bill be now read the third time, [240] 1602

Reference to past Debates—A Question referring to what occurred in a past debate of this Session is not in Order, [238] 1403

Reference to Speeches in the other House—It would not be in Order to quote speeches made during the current Session in the other House of Parliament, [237] 1262; [242] 228

Select Committees—Nomination of Members—It is necessary that Notice be given of the name of a Member proposed to be added to a Select Committee, [239] 1192

PETITIONS

In the ordinary course a Petition will go before the Committee on Public Petitions, and if they consider it of sufficient importance they will recommend that it be printed. If the Committee do not take that course, it is competent for an hon. Member to move that it be printed.—Indian Taxation Petition, [238] 1596

A Petition praying that the House will present articles of impeachment against Lord Beaconsfield and cause him to be arrested for high crimes and misdemeanours being offered—it was asked whether such a Petition was in Order. Mr. Speaker said, the Petition would in the ordinary course go before the Select Committee on Petitions, who, if they thought it out of Order, would, no doubt, make a Special Report to the House. Mr. Speaker saw nothing out of Order in the Petition, [242] 215

A certain document offered to the House although termed a Memorial was substantially a Petition, properly worded, and concluding with a prayer. Mr. Speaker thought that, under these circumstances, the document, although termed a Memorial, might be received if the House should think proper, [240] 1682

PRIVILEGE

The Report [of the Public Petitions Committee] involves a Question of Breach of Privilege on the part of persons who have forged signatures to a Petition to this House; and if this debate be adjourned it would take precedence of all other public proceedings of the House on the day to which it might be adjourned, [238] 1741

When an hon. Member complains of a breach of Privilege having been committed by the publication of what he regards as a libel on a Member of this House, he is bound to bring up the newspaper itself in which the article complained of appears, [239] 536

The House being engaged in the consideration of "Questions," the observations of the hon. Member, not being in the form of a Question, are out of Order, [239] 207

I have to point out to the hon. Member (Dr Kenealy) and this House that the hon. Member brought to the Table of the House yesterday a Question which was, in fact, substantially the same Question as that which he now proposes to put to the Secretary of State, with a view to its being put on the Notice Paper. The hon. Member was informed, by my direction, that such a Question could not be properly put according to the Rules and Practice of the House; and it was pointed out to him that if he desired to raise a question of that character it must be done by specific Motion, [239] 669

Argumentative Questions—Privilege of Members—Among the Rules and Orders of the House is one which declares that no Question is to be offered containing matter of argument or opinion. And Mr. Speaker declares at length his duties as the Guardian of the Rules and Orders of the House; and explains the course he had thought it his duty to pursue in regard to a Question proposed to be offered by the hon. Member for Stoke, [240] 35, 651; [242] 390
